Leon Berg, manager of the Lyric Theater, in Dayton, showed true hospitality to visiting delegates to the convention last week of a rather unusual nature. Through a representative of the Melachrino Company, the concern manufacturing the cigarettes of that name, he obtained a large quantity of the smokes, and distributed them to the visiting exhibitors, and few got away from Dayton without this much-appreciated souvenir.

"The Spoilers," a seven-reel Selig feature, made its initial appearance in Southern Ohio at Dayton, O., last week, being shown at the New Victoria. The picture was shown for the entire week without a let-up in attendance.

One of the few municipal executives of the country, if not the only one, who is also a photoplay magnate, is J. S. Davis, mayor of New Boston, O. He operates a lively and well-patronized house there, recently making arrangements for some new construction. On account of the rather small size of New Boston, Mayor Davis' duties in his official capacity do not keep him very busy, and he therefore decided to add to his income and his interests by entering the picture business, which he has done with considerable success.

The manager of the Cub Theater, of Wilmington, O., recently advertised his program rather cleverly by characterizing it as "one mile of high-class film at every performance." Also, realizing the popularity of the big Famous Players releases, he takes the precaution of advertising regularly that Monday is Famous Players day, in order that those who desire to see these productions may keep tab of them without trouble. The Cub has prospered accordingly, demonstrating again the truth of the ancient adage to the effect that it pays to advertise.

MISSOURI.

CARL BORNSCHEIN, well known exhibitor of Ellsworth, Kan., was married recently, his bride being Miss Clementine Powers, of Ellsworth. Mr. Bornschein, with his father, operates the Elite, one of the popular motion picture houses at Ellsworth.

The White Way, a new theater at Concordia, Kan., will be opened to the public in the immediate future. The house will be the handsomest in Concordia, being a new structure. Office rooms are included in the upper floors of the house.

A recent visitor to Kansas City was L. C. Bauer, of the Dutchess Theater, of Gallatin, Mo. Mr. Bauer had a surprise in store for film men, being accompanied by a winsome young woman whom he introduced as Mrs. Bauer. The exhibitor's bride was formerly Miss Kathlyn Kline, of Gallatin.

F. R. Marcell, of Marysville, Mo., has opened quarters in that town for the purpose of taking moving pictures of scenes of local interest.

L. H. Weber, owner of the Cozy Theater, of Marshall, Mo., has followed the example of many other exhibitors throughout the State by opening an airdome on property adjoining the theater. The open air theater will be used during the summer, the orthodox house being available in inclement weather.

The Trio Theater at Galt, Mo., has been completed and will be opened to the public shortly. G. W. Rusk is the owner of the new house, which has a seating capacity of 350. A five-piece orchestra will dispense music. A program made up of moving pictures exclusively will be shown.

Alvin Lundgren has added about 400 seats to the airdome at Minneapolis, Kan.

P. H. Wolfe, proprietor of the Majestic Theater, at Wilson, Kan., has opened an airdome. The Majestic will be renovated and will be reopened early in the fall.

The Rex Theater, of Hamilton, Mo., has undergone improvements. The seating capacity has been enlarged and the stage remodeled to conform with modern requirements.

A. L. Schuhardt has resumed the management of the Gem Theater, of Trenton, Mo. Mrs. Josie Brown, formerly connected with the Gem, has reopened the Elite Theater in Trenton.

Archie Blue, manager of the New Theater at Salina, Kan., has been appointed on a committee to make arrangements for a fall carnival in Salina. Mr. Blue left recently for the North to arrange for the affair, which is an annual one, and attracts hundreds of visitors to the city.

The Electric Theater, operated in Kansas City, Kan., by the Grubel Brothers, has been closed pending the remodeling of the house. About $30,000 is to be spent in making the theater one of the handsomest on the Kansas side.

H. P. Christie, operator at the Byjo Theater, in Kansas City, has returned from his vacation considerably richer than when he left. This was made possible by Mr. Christie's powers as a ventriloquist. The operator lost a leg two years ago and decided at that time to make a living on the stage. He developed his powers and has appeared in vaudeville from time to time. His ability scored a hit with residents of Ottawa and other towns visited during his vacation, which cost him nothing.

R. L. White, who has been special representative of the World Film Corporation, will manage the Kansas City branch indefinitely. J. Erwin Dodson left for New York, after giving up the management of the World's branch. Mr. White probably will resume road work in the fall, but will remain in Kansas City for the present.

The Crystal Theater, located at Twelfth street and Grand avenue, has been closed by Roy Snipp, the former manager. The house was in a district thickly populated with moving picture houses and was unable to compete successfully. The Wonderland, the Twelfth Street Theater and two others are within a block of the Crystal, which has had an interesting career. The house has inclined toward pictures of the more sensational kind, and has had more than one disagreement with the local censors.

J. W. Cotter has opened the Star Theater, at Joplin, Mo. The house is an old one, but has been remodeled, the seating capacity being brought up to 1,000 and other changes made. Under the new regime, the Star is the largest motion picture house in Joplin.

Hot weather has apparently affected the moving picture business in Kansas City to a lesser degree than might have been expected. Exhibitors have done everything possible to secure low temperatures within their houses, with a fair degree of success. Kansas City residents apparently have appreciated these efforts and have responded by continuing their visits regardless of weather conditions. High class attractions also have had something to do with the big business, while one of the biggest wheat crops in the history of Kansas also has injected more confidence into local residents.

P. J. Concannon has begun improvements in his theater at Emporia, Kan., planning to spend about $5,000. Mr. Concannon is the new secretary of the Kansas league, and has met with more than an ordinary measure of success as an exhibitor.

A new $20,000 home for silent drama is to go up at Marshall, Mo. Kennedy & Stiegemeyer, St. Louis architects, have completed plans for the new structure, and the contract has been awarded. The identity of the owner has been withheld.

If some genius would invent an electric light which would repel, rather than attract, winged insects of all kinds, he would win a fortune and the everlasting gratitude of Kansas City exhibitors. Most of the latter believe in illumination and plenty of it on the exterior of their theaters. During the hot weather, the use of electric current has had some unpleasant adjuncts, thousands of insects hovering around the lights.

A new Hippodrome, costing $30,000, is to be erected in Terrel Tex., it is reported.

The Cameragraph Company of Phoenix, Ariz., a foreign corporation, has been granted permission to do business in the state of Kansas with a capital of $9,250.

Cecil Mears has closed his airdome at Blytheville, Ark.

Plans for the Arkansas state building at the fair at San Francisco, which have just been submitted to the state commission, show that it will contain a moving picture theater.

Henry Reed has leased the Cozy Theater at Wagoner, Okla., and plans to use principally moving pictures in its operation.

Changes in the policy of the Rex Theater at Waco, Tex., will make it exclusively a feature house, using the Frohman K. & E. and Kleine productions.

A. J. Key of Marshall, Mo., has awarded the contract for the construction of an opera house at that place to cost $17,000.

An airdome playing pictures has been opened at Farmersville, Tex., by W. F. Cornes & Son, who also operate the Palace Opera House and Dreamland Theater at that place.

"Words failed" the Hippodrome Theater, at Dallas, Tex., when it tried to tell how the Confederate Veterans at "The Battle of Gettysburg" paid the grandest tribute ever made to a film in Dallas. But the advertising man at least conveyed the idea with: "Rose as one man and cheered continuously as Pickett's Noblemen charged the heights to the strains of 'Dixie.' * * * If you could have seen these dear old fellows' eyes wet with tears of memory and seen their shoulders shaking with sobs you could then appreciate the realism of this picture."

Transfer of stock has shifted control of the Hippodrome Theater at Waco, Tex., to Waco parties; Dallas stockholders formerly were in the majority. W. D. Rondthaler has succeeded M. D. Singleton as manager. One change in policy is that hereafter there will be no more Sunday shows at the house. The new manager is featuring "The Million Dollar Mystery."

The Royal Theater at San Antonio, Tex., heeded the requests of his patrons and gave four consecutive days to return engagements of Mary Pickford in four of the Famous Players features.

The Iris Theater (a photoplay theater) Kirkville, Mo., "extends a cordial invitation to all lovers of good moving scenery." Moore & White opened the house July 6.

When the Houston, Tex., chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution wanted to raise a fund to buy flags for some of the schools the management of the Isis Theater came to the rescue. Appropriately enough, the film shown was from J. Fenimore Cooper's "The Spy."

Wasson & Swindler, already operating two moving picture houses at Navasota, Tex., have purchased from Chester Hardy the Grand Theater at that place.

Instead of a bulky exhibit at the State fair this year the Northwestern State Normal School at Alva, Okla, is going to take the school via the moving picture route to the thousands of visitors to the exposition. About 1,500 feet of film, showing the different departments will be exhibited each day. The contract for the pictures was awarded to the Kansas Motion Picture Company of Wichita, Kan., and the work was done by Walter Bell. The pictures which Bell recently made at Pittsburg, Kans., of the State Manual Training School were a good attraction at the Marple Theater in Wichita, inasmuch as they were shown soon after the buildings at Pittsburg were destroyed by fire.

A benefit for the Boiler Makers' Union was given by the Peoples' Theater at Beaumont, Tex.

Local capitalists at Ballinger, Tex., are contemplating the construction of a new theater building there, it is reported.

According to press dispatches W. T. Smith, a large land owner near Cottonwood Falls, Kans., expects to celebrate his sixtieth birthday, sometime in August, by attending, for the first time, a moving picture show.

The Majestic Theater at St. Joseph, Mo., probably will follow its regular winter policy of moving pictures and vaudeville.

From Shreveport, La., comes the news of a ruse used by striking moving picture operators to "pull out" an operator who was still working, unaware that his fellows had quit. The management of the house refused to allow anybody to approach the operating room. A telegram failed. The strikers fixed up a registered letter and as the manager dared not interfere with the delivery of the United States mails, it reached the lone worker. He quit and the manager had to take care of the projection. Through the efforts of the Central Trades Council it was agreed to arbitrate the difference and the next day the houses were running as usual.

OHIO.

THE Kleervue Film Company will break ground at Elyria soon for a big studio. A building permit was recently secured for the erection of a $30,000 plant. Cleveland capital is interested in the company. Players will be engaged and films staged as soon as the plant is completed. The Lake Shore Electrical line informed the Kleervue it will be about two weeks before a switch from the main line to the property of the company is completed. For the past two years the Kleervue has been making arrangements to install a plant at Elyria, but the financing has just been arranged.

Thal & Aftel, architects, Toledo, are asking bids on a theater building for the Orient Feature Company.

The Carlyon Theater, Superior avenue and E. 124th street, Cleveland, will undergo a complete renovation and be redecorated in the near future. Manager Horsey is determined to keep his house thoroughly up to date. He will install a unit lighting system.

Mrs. O. L. Trippet will build a theater at 13715 St. Clair avenue, Cleveland.

RARIDAN.

ILLINOIS.

ILLINOIS organizations, as a rule, are taking little interest in the progress of the Smith-Hughes bill for a national censorship of moving pictures which is now before Congress. A few of the newspapers, however, do not believe that a federal regulation of the films is the best plan. Aurora is the one community that is the exception. In that city the Juvenile Protective Association is lending its efforts toward the passage of the bill and the congressmen from that district and the United States senators from Illinois have been asked to do all they can for it. Some time ago a survey of the moving picture theaters in Aurora was made under the direction of the Juvenile Protective Association. Tours of inspection were made by Miss Pearl Diest, social worker for the organization; Miss Anne Forsyth, Aurora policewoman, and representatives of other societies declared to be for uplift. The results of this survey were not made public, but were sent to the redoubtable Major Funkhouser, of the Chicago censorship, for his expert opinion. The movement among Illinois organizations which are being urged to go to the aid of the Smith-Hughes bill is due to the agitation of Dean Walter T. Sumner of the Social Service Board of Chicago.

The airdome picture shows in the state have had the advantage the last week, although weather conditions have been a little more favorable for the regular photoplay houses. The Springfield exhibitors still continue under a heat hoodoo, the thermometer there registering some days as much as eighteen degrees higher than in Chicago.

E. P. Thompson is erecting a new airdome at the southeast corner of the public square, in Plymouth, which will be devoted to moving pictures.

Local pictures were shown at the Star Theater in East Moline, July 3.

Watching the making of moving pictures was one of the diversions of the Fourth of July crowd at Al Fresco Park, Peoria. Films were made of the explosion of a balloon in the air and other events about the resort which were shown later to local patrons.

Pictures of a department store picnic, made by Osgood, the local cameramen, were on an interesting bill at the Auditorium at Galesburg.

Two days of talking pictures recently were introduced into the schedule of the Colonials at Galesburg.

The I. C. U. Film Company of Chicago has been incorporated with a capital stock of $5,000 to develop, lease and deal in moving pictures. The incorporators are William F. McCracken, Jr., Norman H. Pritchard and Urban A. Lavery.

Patrons of the Majestic Theater at Albion had a novelty in the form of local pictures taken by Roy Elwess. This house also has been conducting a "Country Store."

The Newberry Amusement Company of Chicago has been granted a charter by the secretary of state to do a moving picture business, with a capital stock of $2,400. The incorporators are Meyer Morton, Herbert M. Lautman and I. Karl Davidson.

Pitner's moving picture show at Fairfield was open the afternoon of Booster Day, July 4, and out-of-town persons were admitted free, tickets being furnished by the merchants of the city.

J. E. Mitchell has been planning a number of changes to the Carbondale Opera House at Carbondale and the house will be converted into a moving picture theater.

The Frank T. Thompson Big Tent Show, playing pictures, has been making week stands at Davis Junction, Stillman Valley, Byron and other northern Illinois towns. The company carries its own electric light plant and an air calliope and has been welcomed in the theaterless towns.

The Fourth of July special program with "The Battle of Gettysburg" inaugurated the anniversary week bills of the Playhouse in Oak Park. A whole week of features was given by Manager Hugh Flannery in celebration of the rounding out of the first successful year. Both the interior and exterior of the theater were appropriately decorated.

As a part of its rejuvenation plan the Bijou Theater at Monmouth has installed a seven-piece Wurlitzer Orchestra.

Again the moving picture show is the forerunner of progress, bringing to mankind the modern inventions. The Lyric Theater at Winchester advertises that its oscillating fan is the first one in public use in Winchester.

R. A. Shobe of Kentland is manager of the Electric Theater, which has been opened at Sheldon.

The editor of the Wilmette News, at Wilmette, tells the public the moving picture shows are attracting children away from the public library, but he does not do it to alarm; he feels that the shows, whose programs are watched, are doing an educational work in a less tiresome manner.

Bart Bresee is in charge of the Village Airdome at Averyville, a suburb of Peoria, while Mr. and Mrs. Will Forbes are conducting the Airdome operated at Princeville by the same owners.

A crowd of 800 persons was turned away from the night show when the Grand, at Rockford,, ran the first installment of "The Million Dollar Mystery," and the management is pushing its matinee business.

The Home Circle Skydome has been opened at Nineteenth and State streets, in East St. Louis, by Charles Roach. A five-reel show is being given for five cents.

Anticipating that other Illinois cities will do as they have done in the past, and pattern after Chicago, downstate communities are watching the Chicago plan to segregate the adults and children at moving picture shows. One editor thinks "the young grow older earlier nowadays," and adds "Might it not be well to acknowledge the fact that the suppositional 'young person' really ceases to exist as a 'young person' at a suprisingly tender age?" Any measure barring males and females under 21 years of age, as suggested, certainly would seriously affect small city exhibitors.

When the name for the house at Streator, conducted by W. E. Hearst, was selected a year or so ago, all sorts of possibilities for clever advertising were seen. Now it just naturally falls into the idea of evading the hot weather, when used in such lines as this: "Come in! The weather's always fine at Dawn."

Moving picture trips to "The Holy Land," the "San Francisco Disaster," "The Life of Moses," "The Life and Conversion of John Bunyan" and other religious subjects in films, illustrated songs and sermon-lectures are the methods used in the evangelistic meetings being held in the Presbyterian Church at Mt. Zion by Rev. G. K. Little of Freeport.

In addition to its four-reel program the Ouataga Theater, at Upper Alton, one night had a cracker-eating contest "between three redheads."

Frank Talbot, formerly of St. Louis, severed his connection with the Skydome at East St. Louis, which he had been conducting for Louis Landau, Jr., and returned to St. Louis.

"Mary Pickford Weeks" have been conducted with success by two Illinois managers. The Star Theater, at Aurora, had the little favorite in seven different pictures in as many days, while the Princess, at Peoria, in a review gave consecutively for two days each five of the Famous Players features in which Miss Pickford starred. The Park Theater, at Champaign, was unable to handle the crowds the first time, and brought "Caprice" back for a second engagement.

G. W. Bradbury, experienced moving picture man of Rochelle, has purchased the Venetian Theater, at Waterman, from Mr. Lewis. He made a number of improvements to the house before it was opened to the public under his management.

C. N. Jacob has sold Dreamland Theater in Chatsworth to H. V. Allford of Kankakee, who has assumed charge. Jacob has purchased a moving picture house in Bloomington.

The redecorated Hippodrome at Alton has been opened. Manager W. M. Sauvage has announced his intention of making the Hippodrome an exclusive picture house until the Airdome is closed for the summer.

Construction of the new opera house at Heyworth is taped. The house is being erected by a company of which A. S. Jones is president.

Papers of incorporation have been issued at Springfield to one of the most novel moving picture enterprises yet chartered in the state. The Jones Brothers Railroad Moving Picture Shows of Springfield, with a capital stock of $2,500, expects to follow to a certain extent the methods of circusmen. Edward Jones of Springfield is at the head of the project. Other incorporators are Anna M. and Ralph C. Jones. A Jones Brother Railroad Circus was started in Springfield a few years ago but was shortlived.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

EFFORTS to advocate legislation to permit the opening of moving picture theaters on Sundays and to fix by agreement a minimum admission price of 10 cents, met with little support and much opposition at a meeting of picture theater owners and managers here on Saturday, July 20. The meeting was held in the Imperial Theater in Stratford avenue, conducted by Albert Skidmore. Twenty-four managers or owners of motion pictures attended and a preliminary organization of an association to be known as the Motion Picture Theater Managers' Association of Bridgeport was effected. There are about 40 motion picture theaters in Bridgeport and those at the meeting hope to interest the other managers and secure them as members.

Charles Brody, manager of the Elite Theater, was chosen president pro tem and permanent officers will be elected at an another meeting to be held in the near future. Several theater managers in this city have been actively advocating the opening of picture theaters on Sundays, though without success. Moving picture shows are permitted on Sundays in Waterbury and New Britain and were allowed in Hartford until about two years ago. The men behind the movement to open the theaters here on Sundays are largely responsible for the effort to organize the theater managers, although the majority of those who joined the association are opposed to opening Sundays, and so expressed themselves during the discussion of the proposition.

No agreement could be reached on a minimum admission of 10 cents. Some favored 10 cents for evening performances with a 5-cent matinee. That is the prevailing rate of admission, although some theaters charge 10 cents to all parts of the house in the afternoon and 10 and 15 cents in the evening, and 25 cents for box seats. One or two of the larger downtown theaters show for 5 cents general admission afternoon and evening with a few reserved seats at night for 10 cents. It was the managers of these latter theaters who objected to the raise in price and prevented definite action. The matter will be taken up again at the next meeting.

All were opposed to a state board of censors which has been proposed and endorsed by several of the pastors' associations in the larger cities, as well as in Bridgeport. It is the plan when a permanent organization is effected to take steps to have representation at Hartford when the legislature meets in January to oppose the passage of legislation which may create a board of state censors or which may take from or supersede the local authorities in the censorship which they now exercise.

Invitations have been sent to every motion picture theater in the city to attend the next meeting, and it is predicted that a majority will enroll with the association.

PAUL HOPPEN sold the Radio theatre at Kearney, Neb., to L. Dittonm, an experienced moving picture man of McCook, Neb., who has assumed charge of the house. Hoppen will operate the airdome at Kearney for the remainder of the summer.

Because the front of the building has a colonial effect, J. J. Kreutzer & Son, Carl, who purchased the Lyric theater at Peru, Ind., from Walker & Son, have changed the name to the Colonial. The house was reopened the first day of July after being closed for remodeling.

Children paying five cents admission to the Elite theater at Defiance, O., are admitted free to the Lion. The Lion recently gave an exhibition of "Joan of Arc" for the benefit of the Women's Federated Clubs.

Little Jane Francke, the two-year old daughter of Charles Francke, manager of the Airdome and Krug theater in Omaha, Neb., was filmed in a number of cute poses by J. C. Henoweth, moving picture man from the University of Nebraska.

"The managers of the Orpheum and the Gem are a credit not only to the business of the city but to the movie business in general," says the Republican of Plymouth, Ind.

James Keever and A. Wolk of Portsmouth, Ohio, have secured a tent, projecting apparatus, 20,000 feet of film and a portable electric light plant and will give week stands of moving picture shows at small towns in Ohio.

ONE of the first acts of Manager Charles McCall on taking charge of the Arc Theater, Monticello, was to give a benefit for charity. McCall succeeds Jack Burhorn as manager. The theater is owned by George L. Fries, of Kankakee, Ill.

Manager Mike Maas of the Dreamland Theater, Mt. Vernon, is having his house redecorated and overhauled. The inside color scheme will be white, and the front and lobby given a mahogany finish.

One of the attractions at the Connersville Free Fair is to be a motion picture show. Though no charge is being made for seeing the show, an ampitheater is being built and seats will be charged for, the management being of the impression these seats will pay for the film service, perhaps more.

Manager W. F. Lightner gave away roses to the women at the formal opening of the new Yale Theater in Princeton. The new theater occupies the lower floor of the Sprowl building, which was remodeled for the purpose. It is nicely arranged for safety, ventilation and sanitation. The machine booth is asbestos-lined and has a concrete floor, and two Powers 6A machines have been installed. A gold fiber screen is in use. Three sections of comfortable seats make the seating capacity near 800. Enough fans have been installed so that Manager Lightner declares there is a complete change of air every two minutes.

Frank Holland, manager of the Orpheum Theater, Terre Haute, with the Terminal Photo Play Company, will make a moving picture to fit the song "On the Banks of the Wabash." The film will be made on the Wabash River near Fort Harrison. The song was made the Indiana state song by the last legislature.

Judge J. S. Lairy refused to permit Sam O. Berman, receiver for the Grand and Tokyo theaters, Logansport, Ind., to accept a price of $2,500 for the Grand, holding that the property should bring more money. The Grand has always been a good money-maker. The houses were owned by Reife & Seithers. The Tokyo has been closed.

Jap Wilson, Nappanee, Ind., sold the Red Mill Theater at Columbia City, to George Brookins, of Columbia City. Brookins now controls all three picture houses in Columbia City.

Perry Thurston, owner of the Crystal Theater, Union City, will soon open a house in Versailles. The new house is to be called the Jewel.

Walter Talley, proprietor of the Empire Airdome at Milan, is building another at Dillsboro. Two shows a week, Tuesday and Saturday, will be given. The admission is five and ten cents.

WILLIAM.

LYNCHBURG, VA.

RAPID progress is being made on the two new motion picture theaters which are now in the course of construction in the heart of the business section of the city. One is being built by Hubert C. Elliott, a Roanoke capitalist, on Main street, in close proximity to two of the old-established theaters, being just across the street from the Gayety, and the other is being backed by M. L. Hoffheimer, of Richmond, who is interested in a string of theaters throughout the South. This theater is on Main street, but further away from the theater quarter. It is stated unofficially that only pictures that will appeal to women and children will be offered at the Hoffheimer Theater as soon as it is opened to the public, but there is a rumor that vaudeville will be put on to compete with the other vaudeville house which has been operating for several years.

W. H. Hendrix, who came to Lynchburg from Durham, N. C., several days ago to take charge of the Universal Theater, succeeding J. B. Craver, who was promoted by the Piedmont Amusement Company to a position on the road, did not remain long and Mr. Craver was recalled to assume the management of the new Lynchburg house until other arrangements could be made. The Universal is the most attractive house in Lynchburg.

Dr. Chas. A. Pryor's Mexican war pictures in four reels did a big business July 8 at the Gayety Theater. They were offered with a multiple reel Keystone, and large crowds packed the theater all day.

The Trenton Theater is now being managed by Corbin Sheild who has been identified with many Wells' theaters throughout the South in recent years. He was formerly in charge of the Academy of Music in Lynchburg several years ago and is known to be a capable and efficient theatrical man. Since assuming the management of the Trenton Theater, he has increased the business of the house to a noticeable extent and is making good right off the reel. He has contracted to secure the Jesse L. Lasky Features on regular release days.

The Belvedere Theater, one of the oldest and most reliable in Lynchburg, is showing the Famous Players' releases as often as they are being produced, and every day that these features are offered the house is packed to capacity. The Mary Pickford pictures are the biggest favorites, and Manager Cobbs is anticipating a big business when he gets "The Eagle's Mate."

HARRY L. FISHER, a mail carrier, and F. W. Walker, assistant postmaster at Muscatine, have been granted a patent on a non-rewinding film reel. The inventors declare that the device can be attached to machines already in operation or built into machines in the course of manufacture with little deviation from the original model. The film is wound upon the lower reel from the outside to the center. The attachment consists of a transmission rod connecting the two reels; the lower reel being placed at an angle of about 45 degrees; the reels are reversible and have detachable sides. When in operation one side is removed from the lower reel, a band is placed on the other side, four spring fingers guide the film into the band as fast as it is released from the upper reel. After the film has been run through the lower reel is released, the band removed and the detachable side placed into position.

Harry Smithers has leased a building in Sheffield and equipped it for a moving picture theater. He will call his house the Star.

David Prior of Nevada has purchased a moving picture theater in Fayette.

John Wilkens now has a monopoly of the moving picture business at Reinback, having purchased the equipment of William Wolff and taken over the latter's lease on the opera house. Picture bills at the opera house will be continued on Thursdays and Saturdays, at least temporarily. Wolff will have charge of this show.

L. O. Brewer of Dumont, formerly a newspaper man there, has purchased the Iris Theater at Hamburg from L. H. Carder.

With enthusiastic loyalty to his new home, F. Schafer has called the house, which he recently acquired in Fairfield, "The Fairfield." He has installed a new Wurlitzer Orchestra and made a genuinely attractive theater out of his purchase. Later, he announces, he expects to have special pictures for the children.

R. L. Lamb has sold his moving picture equipment to George H. Carson, a furniture dealer of Pilot Mound, who has fitted up the Airdome at Pilot Mound and will operate a photoplay show this summer.

F. J. Smid's new Ideal Theater on Fourteenth avenue, between Second and Third streets, in Cedar Rapids, opened to a good business with Mary Pickford in "Caprice." Famous Players' features will be used every Sunday.

A profitable special attraction at the Isis Theater in Cedar Rapids was the reel of the Elks State Convention at Iowa City.

Denton, Wiggington & Co. has opened a moving picture theater at Macedonia.

A new moving picture theater at Akron is contemplated by H. W. Johnson.

C. W. Hill has opened a photoplay house at George.

Allender & Junkins have sold their moving picture theater at Vail to Ed Quirk and Frank Sheridan.

The new moving picture house to be operated at Independence by F. C. Knee of Waterloo will be known as the Allerton.

Moving picture theater licenses at Council Bluffs will remain at $50 a year, the ordinance demanding an increase being defeated 5 to 3 in the city council.

THE MARK-BROCK people and Lawande Bros have come to terms, and the result is that the Scala theater will be operated by the former. Louis B. Hecht will continue to manage the house, and announces that it will be closed for some time in August, pending extensive alterations and improvements.

Elaborate preparations are being made here for the initial showing of Universal's "The Trey o' Hearts." The story will run serially in the "Herald and Daily Telegraph."

Mr. Herring, manager of the Mount Royal theater in the North End, has taken a much needed rest. During his absence the house will be looked after by J. Lanthier. Mr. Lanthier has had plenty of experience in the exhibiting business, having been connected with various theaters in Ontario and the United States. "The Million Dollar Mystery," Thanhouser's big serial, is doing excellent business at this theater.

The immortal Biograph biblical drama "Judith of Bethulia," had a revival in Montreal at the Imperial. The scenes showing the storming of the walls of Bethulia, and the scene between Holofernes and Judith in the former's tent were greatly enhanced by the playing of Prof. MacClymont on the Hope-Jones Unit Orchestra. Recent features at this theater were "Mr. Barnes of New York," Kathlyn Williams in "The Leopard's Foundling," and Mary Pickford in Biograph's "The Beast at Bay," and "Wilful Peggy." The ventilation at the house is well looked after. It requires 1200 lbs. of ice daily to cool the air in the auditorium. A new water-cooler has been installed in the fover. The prices have also been changed. The new prices in the evening are fifteen cents for orchestra seats, ten cents in the gallery, and twenty-five cents for box seats.

So far no one has been awarded the liberal prize offered by the management of the London theater to the gentleman or lady who does not laugh at the comedy offerings on Bunny Night at this theater. Mr. Kashin, the manager, certainly knows a funny film when he sees it.

Mr. Wright, manager of the Princess theater, the local Shuberts house, has secured for two weeks the wonderful motion pictures depicting the death-defying adventures of the famous photographer, Paul J. Rainey, in the jungles of East Africa. It is stated that this will be the only presentation of this subject in Canada, as they will be taken direct from Montreal to Chicago, where they remain for a year.

A further step towards the advancement of Canadian education, is the announcement that the Dominion General Film Corporation, Ltd., Royal Trust Bldg., Montreal, is to specialize in the producing of educational moving picture films, under an Advisory Board consisting of eminent Canadians. The enterprise deserves encouragement and all wish them success in their undertaking.

The photoplay editor of Beck's Weekly is making a strong plea for changes in favor of the exhibitor. He also sheds a little light on the question of Canadian-made films. We quote from a recent article. "In Canada, at the moment, the production of moving pictures is insignificant. With a mis en scene, unequalled in variety, beauty and magnificence, with a population including every attribute of the picturesque, and with no lack of wit or intelligence on the part of its sons and daughters, Canada has not yet been able to make a commercial success of film production.....The chief reason for this state of affairs appears to be a certain apathy on the part of the Canadian public, to the commercial possibilities of the business. I have before me as I write the prospectus of a company exclusively Canadian launched under a directorate including some of the best known, the ablest and the most respected men in this city, that has utterly failed to obtain the moderate amount of capital requisite to enable it to carry out its scheme of Canadian film production. It seems ridiculous that for want of a few thousand dollars in this city of wealthy men, this enterprise so promising of results alike gratifying to the commercial, the educational and the ethical instincts of Canada should be languishing in abeyance.

"Coming now to the actual exhibition of moving pictures in this country, and particularly in Montreal, it appears that the industry suffers in some respects from a lack of sympathy on the part of the authorities, both provincial and municipal. A curious instance of this has been brought to my notice on my preliminary peregrination in search of information, and is typical of the attitude of the official mind towards a matter new to its intelligence. A well known manager recently imported a celebrated film founded on a classic English work of fiction, from the Old Country, where it had had a great success and was much appreciated for its beauty and interest. The film had been used several times and was invoiced to the purchaser at four cents a foot, the price actually paid for it. The film did not reach its destination and on enquiry the purchaser was informed that it was held up by reason of a false declaration having been made as to its value. He was told that 8 cents per foot was the proper price for films and that duty must be paid on that figure. No explanation or discussion was entertained, and my friend, who had already paid duty and charges to the amount of $21.62 was mulcted in a further $27.11 before he was able to secure possession of his film."

DETECTIVE AND MATCHMAKER (August 3).—"Red-Eye Bill," a reformed dare-devil, is delighted to receive from a wealthy uncle a present of a wonderful horse, whose name is "Intellect." Bill "introduces" his sweetheart, Peggy, to the horse, and the animal takes a great liking to her. Later, through a combination of circumstances, Bill is suspected of a crime, and when he sees the Sheriff and his men coming thinks he is wanted for some old misdeeds. He gallops furiously away, and they succeed in capturing only his horse, which escapes in a novel manner, and proves a most effective messenger between Bill and his sweetheart. As a result, Peggy gets the local attorney on the case, and eventually the real culprit is apprehended. Shortly after Bill is restored to honorable citizenship, he meets Jane, pretty and coquettish, and becomes infatuated with her, although "Intellect" shows strong disapproval of the girl. Hearing of Bill's wealthy uncle, Jane urges an early marriage, and the two make hasty preparations. The horse seems to know what is going on, for he hides the girl's wedding clothes, and then intercepts a note between the two, which effectually puts an end to the affair. "Intellect" then goes to Peggy's home, kneels for her to mount and carries her to Bill. She dismounts and the horse gently nudges its master towards Peggy, indicating plainly that Bill shall kiss her. He takes the hint and "Intellect" nods his head in approval. After the wedding ceremony, the horse brings the happy couple a most surprising gift, which causes a hearty laugh from all present.

WARFARE IN THE SKIES (Special—Two Parts—August 4).—Richard Lawrence, an Army Aviator, introduces his friend, Count Zurich, to Zenia, his father's beautiful ward. The Count becomes infatuated with the girl and determines to win her. General Lawrence, Richard's father, is ordered to prepare for war, as Prince Dureseign is gathering an army to overthrow the government. In a terrific battle, the forces of Dureseign are driven back. Zenia and Richard fall in love, he proposes and she accepts him. Dureseign's forces are greatly augmented in numbers, surround General Lawrence's army and the General sends his son in a fast aeroplane for reinforcements. After an encounter with the enemy's sharpshooters, he gets safely away. Count Zurich flies to the enemy's camp and traitorously arranges to bombard General Lawrence's ramparts by aeroplane, for which Prince Dureseign is to deliver Zenia into his hands after defeating the General's army. Richard, returning in his air machine, seeing what the Count is preparing to do, charges full speed, directly at the Count's machine. With a fearful crash, the two aeroplanes collide in midair and fall to the ground in a mass of wreckage. The Count is killed instantly. Richard is badly injured, and Zenia disguises herself and goes to the enemy's hospital to nurse him. She is recognized and ordered shot as a spy. Richard escapes to his own lines, returning in an aeroplane in time to rescue the girl by dropping bombs into the enemy's midst. He swoops down, helps her into the machine and brings her back to his father, where, after a glad reunion, they receive his blessing. Reinforcements arrive, Prince Dureseign's army is decisively defeated and the warfare in the skies is ended.

MEMORIES IN MEN'S SOULS (Special—Two Parts—August 6).—To prove his assertion that every man of forty has met and held the hand of Romance, Jones tells his fellow club members the story of Graham's life. Graham is also a club member, of an extremely reticent nature. While working as a poor artist in Paris, Graham falls heir to a large legacy and at once sails for New York. On the steamer, he meets Eleanor Emmons, a romantic young girl, traveling with her chaperone, the acquaintance ripens into love and the two plight their troth. On arriving in New York, she is met by her guardian, who hurries the girl away. Then follows the old, old story. Her guardian, who wishes the girl to marry his own choice, takes her far from New York and intercepts all correspondence between the young people. Five years later, Eleanor, hopeless of ever hearing from her lover, marries her guardian's choice, while Graham is married and the father of a little boy. Eleanor is left a wealthy widow, learns of her guardian's duplicity in separating her from Graham, and determines to come to New York, in hopes of finding Graham and explaining the cause of their separation. He does not recognize her when she greets him, after the first shock of surprise, his old love returns with an almost overwhelming power. He is about to forget the present conditions and all, when his little son enters. Graham is brought back to a realization that it is now too late, and pointing to the child, says simply, "My son!" and buries his head on his arms, while she goes sadly from the room and out of his life forever.

THE LOCKED HOUSE (August 7).—As the pompous Mayor of Smithtown, Bunny gets a little shock on reading of the attempted assassination of the Mayor of New York, but when his wife suggests he get police protection, laughs at her. He antagonizes some of the local politicians and they send him a threatening letter. Bunny nearly faints when he receives it, but manages to keep up a brave appearance in front of his wife. Meantime, the Police Commissioner orders the Mayor protected and, without advising Bunny, appoints four detectives to watch him. Mrs. Bunny sees two strangely-acting men outside the house, and becoming alarmed, 'phones Bunny, who, seeing two more suspicious characters outside his office, nearly collapses. After partaking of an elaborate lunch with wine, Bunny feels much better and bravely walks home just to show the "desperadoes" he does not fear them. His courage oozes, however, when he spies the two men and he sneaks around the back way. Finding his wife has locked every door and window, he gets in the cellar and starts to ascend by the dumbwaiter. It gets stuck half-way up and Bunny is unable to budge it. His wife hears the racket, and feeling sure it is a maurauder, hastily calls the police. A squad of officers arrive and order Bunny, who has fallen fast asleep in the dumbwaiter, to surrender. Receiving no answer, the cops fire their revolvers. This wakes Bunny up with a start, sending the dumbwaiter crashing to the cellar. He is pounced on by the policemen, and after a terrific struggle, subdued. When they see it is the Mayor, all feel very sheepish. Bunny, looking as though he had been in a train wreck, furiously announces he will "break" every one of them. They leave hastily, while Bunny's wounds are cared for by his sympathizing wife.

THE HOUSE ON THE HILL (Special—Two Parts—August 8).—Mary Dean, the ambitious wife of a laborer in the Newcomb Soap Factory, lives constantly in hopes of some day being the mistress of the Great House on the Hill, the home of Mr. Newcomb, the Boss. Her burning ambition drives her husband on and on, until he is advanced to assistant foreman. Then step by step, Tom Dean is promoted, until at last, from the office of Vice-President, he reaches the President's chair, through the death of Mr. Newcomb. Tom purchases the Newcomb Mansion and the desire of Mary's heart is fulfilled. She finds, however, that her children have gradually grown away from her in their luxurious environment, and become snobbish through the ideas she has inculcated. Her husband, detesting the artificialities of the new life, pleads a business trip and steals off like a truant school-boy to their old home on McGinnis Alley. Here he is genuinely happy and comforable, with only his old pipe for company. Mary sees an old neighbor, notes the wealth of affection bestowed on the woman by her children, which she, Mary, had never received, and begins to realize she has missed the greatest thing in life—love. One night, overcome by a poignant longing to visit once more the familiar scenes, she steals out unobserved. A drunken factory hand accosts her in front of the little house on McGinnis Alley. Just then the door flies open and her husband appears. He drives off the intruder, leads his wife into the house and with his arm about her shoulder, points to a little worsted motto on the wall, reading: "There's No Place Like Home."

"SECOND SIGHT" (August 5).—Near-sighted, testy and an almost impossible-to-live-with old crank. Ponsonby makes life miserable for his wife and those around him. At breakfast, one morning, he accuses his wife of injuring his glasses in some way. She meekly suggests he ought to change them. He gets his hand caught in the sugar bowl, meets with other awkward and embarrassing mishaps and stamps out bellowing with rage, to the oculist for a pair of tortoise-shell glasses. Shortly afterwards, he and his wife, Sarah, their maid, go to their bungalow at Indian Lake, where Ponsonby becomes absolutely unbearable. Sarah, cleaning up, is scared by Ponsonby, and pulls down the stove-pipe, scattering soot all over him. The women beat a hurried retreat and an exciting chase follows, during which Ponsonby whose glasses are in his wife's possession, blunders into many painful accidents. He is chased home at full speed by a big black bear and the affair winds up by his knocking over the stove and burning down the bungalow. After recovering from his experiences, his wife hands him over his glasses and gently reproaches him for his outburst of temper. He admits he has made a fool of himself, and with his arm around his happy little wife, says: "I have learned my lesson. I'm cured of my bad temper forever." His eyes fairly twinkle with good nature, and when their guide sympathizes with him about the loss of their bungalow Ponsonby says he is now too happy to worry about anything.

"WHY PREACHERS LEAVE HOME" (Special—Two Parts—July 25).—The Rev. Dr. Newman receives a telegram requesting his services at a wedding at Redville. While on the train he gets into conversation with a whiskey salesman. The minister being near-sighted and slightly nervous believes he has arrived at the proper station and grabbing a suit case disembarks. He finds after the train has pulled out that he has mistaken Roseville for Redville. He makes the acquaintance of the President of the local bank who asks him to spend the night as there is not another train for Redville until the morrow. The maid takes his suit case to the room he is to occupy and having a strong sense of smell for a certain commodity opens it. Much to her delight she finds it stocked with whiskey and starts in to satisfy her desire. This act causes dinner to be postponed, due to the food being slightly overdone. As the host and his guest are about to retire the Bank President reads of a man going through the country impersonating a minister who is a very heavy drinker and who has the habit of passing worthless checks. His suspicions aroused he orders the maid to get the minister's suit case and upon opening it he discovers the horrible stuff. Convinced this is the imposter he has him arrested at once. Meanwhile a young lady takes the seat in the train left vacant by the minister and attracts the attention of the whiskey salesman, who, wanting to be attentive opens his suit case and much to his surprise finds a Bible and a minister's garb. This convinces the young lady, who is a sister of the prosperous bride that this is the Rev. Dr. Newman. He is made to get off at Redville by the bridal party and attends the dinner party the night before the wedding. He imbibes a bit too freely and after supper starts dancing the tango much to the surprise of the young people. He then makes an excuse and retires. Fortunately a burglar breaks in his room and after a struggle the burglar, who had intended chloroforming his victim, is chloroformed and the salesman changes clothes with him and escapes. The burglar awakes and accidentally upsets a table which awakens the other members of the household. He escapes, however, and is pursued by a posse which the sheriff gathers together. The whiskey salesman meanwhile discovers a motorcycle. Both the whiskey salesman and the burglar are captured in Roseville, where the Rev. Dr. Newman is experiencing the humiliating ordeal of reposing in the county jail. After many explanations the Bank President realizes the great injustice he forced on the real minister. The burglar escapes in the excitement, the Whiskey Salesman has to telegraph his firm for more travelling expenses and the Rev. Dr. Newman arrives at Redville the next day in time to marry the much worried young couple.

"MUSIC HATH CHARMS" (July 31).—An old man and his son are positively daffy on the subject of music much to the annoyance of his wife, who is built on suffragette lines and believes somewhat in their tactics. They receive a telegram that they have been left some money by the death of an uncle, so draining the family treasury for new clothes they start for the lawyer's office. Much to their surprise instead of finding they have been left money they receive a rather decrepit old horse, a broken-down cab and a trunk. While returning home with their inheritance they pass a man carrying a musical instrument. They make a trade with him, agreeing to give him the entire outfit of horse, etc., for his instrument. The new possessor opens the trunk and finds a large amount of money which he refuses to give them saying it was all in the deal. They return home, and while missing the money realize that the charm of music is really more valuable than real money.

"AN ACTRESS' SON" (July 29).—No one must know the age of an actress, as if it were known it would be useless for her to make herself appear young. For this reason a celebrated actress once kept dark the fact that she had a son of 21, and used to meet him by stealth. He met a young girl whose father worshipped respectability, and his mother pretended to be old and infirm, so as not to meet the father. One day she and her son were dining together when they were surprised by the girl and her father. The girl thought the mother was a dangerous rival, but the latter wrote, explaining matters, and offering to meet the father. In the end her actress' charm completely conquered him, and there was a double marriage.

REASON WHY

Simplex

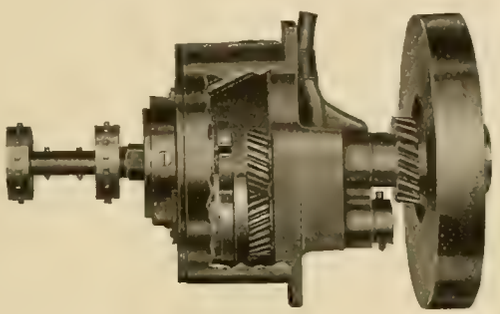
TALK NO. 1

The intermittent movement is the most vital point in a motion picture projector, therefore it is the first feature of the machine which we will discuss in these weekly talks.

It is a well known fact that the intermittent sprocket must be started and stopped sixteen times or more each second. Whenever it starts, it pulls down three-quarters of an inch of film and then must stop dead still. The least movement or quiver is fatal to a steady picture.

To suddenly start or stop a rapidly moving body requires great power and means much strain on the parts employed. The circumference of the Simplex intermittent sprocket travels three-quarters of an inch in one sixty-fourth of a second, or at the rate of 2880 ft. per minute, thus giving some idea of what it means to bring it to an instant stop.



To reduce the strain and vibration to a minimum, it is necessary, first, to make the parts as light as possible consistent with good mechanical principles; and second, to keep the circumferences of the rotating parts near the center of rotation, so as to reduce the peripheral speed and the consequent strain of stopping it dead still.

A glance at the cut will show that the intermittently moving parts of the Simplex carry out these principles and are made so accurately (correct to 1-10000 inch) that we obtain snug fit without undue friction or wear, practically noiseless action and no vibration or back lash. The shape and size of the intermittent sprocket teeth also have much to do with the steadiness of the picture.

DO NOT CONFUSE the cam and star or Geneva movement as used in the Simplex with similar movements of other makes of machines. The principle may be the same, but the distinctly Simplex method of design and accuracy accounts for the great difference in results.

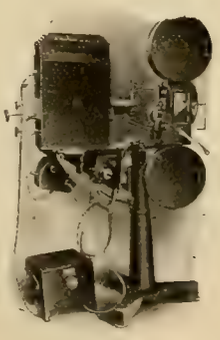
WE CAN PROVE that the intermittent movement as employed in the Simplex projector excels in

Steadiness of picture at fast as well as slow speed.

Ease on sprocket holes of film.

Elimination of rapid wear.

Ease of adjustment and replacement.



DO YOU KNOW that the entire intermittent case, as shown by the cut, can be removed from the machine in 30 seconds, by taking out two screws and loosening two others. It can be put back in the same length of time.

This is only one reason why this remarkable machine has sprung into general use all over the world and is most heartily recommended by all exhibitors and operators who have used it.

Other reasons will be given to you, Mr. Exhibitor and Mr. Operator, but don't wait for them. Write now for our latest Catalog A, which tells all about it.

"HONOR REDEEMED" (Special—Two Parts—August 1).—An old general's son squandered all his wealth and at last his father refused to help him any more. But his mother had a softer heart and would even sell her jewels for him. At last the smash came and as he had forged a signature he had the alternative of payment or arrest. His appeal to his father was in vain, but his mother listened and to save him from dishonor stole from her husband to pay what he owed. He promised to reform and enlist and either to wipe out dishonor in honor or die in the attempt. By a fine act of heroism in storming an Arab fort he won fame and the Legion of Honor and thus wiped out his former disgrace. His mother, who had been ill at his departure and her own shame, soon recovered at the glad tidings and his soldier father readily forgave him and asked him to come home.

"THE TROUSERLESS POLICEMAN" (July 30).—A Moving Picture Company is about to take a scene but find they are short a pair of policeman's trousers. A Cop comes along and after much persuasion is induced to loan his. To escape embarrassment he jumps into an empty barrel which an unkind person starts on a long roll. Just as he has told his superior officer a fine tale of heroism the leading lady of the movies spoils the whole thing by bringing back his trousers.

ESSANAY.

"IN AND OUT" (August 3).—Hans and Fritz are two street musicians. Hans plays the flute and Fritz the bass violin. They have great trouble in finding a boarding house where they are congenial with their fellow boarders, and many side-splitting scenes take place. They finally strike a house where rats, bugs and mice annoy their peaceful slumbers, and after Hans has shot an enormous bed-bug that has carried Fritz to the ceiling, they are chased from the boarding house. They head for the lake, and with the howling mob on one side and the lake on the other, they are forced to use Hans' bass viol as a raft and navigate on the stormy waters until it is safe for them to go ashore.

"HER TRIP TO NEW YORK" (August 4).—Ruth marries Harry and he promises that for a wedding trip he will take her to New York. She makes all preparations for the trip, but he never takes her. Each year he has some excuse that he cannot afford the journey. She, believing that some day he will take her, lives in anticipation of the great pleasure. At last after many years, she breaks down from hard work. The doctor is called and he reminds Harry that he never took Ruth on the promised wedding trip. He sinks on his knees at her bed-side, and after telling her of the wonderful trip they are going to have, Ruth begins to recover.

"THE BUSY BUSINESS BOY AND THE DROPPERS-IN" (August 5).—The Busy Business Boy lands at his desk like the Early Bird with the intention of tearing off a week or two of correspondence in an hour or so. But the Napoleon of finance recks not with the Man with the Funny Puzzle, the Fruit Vender, the Insurance Agent with the Flowing Vocabulary, and last, but not least, with Rube. After two busy hours one letter is started. It's a gay life and about noon Mr. Busy Business is making fine headway. The Rube is the last straw. He demands to be shown the gay White Lights and to Revel in the Ecstacy of Chop Suey. The Busy Business Boy gives up the Ghost and, with the Rube in tow, starts out on the cocktail route. It's a busy finish. Moral: Work is a Snap but Intermissions play Hob with the Nervous System.

I Will Make You a Successful Exhibitor.

How? By putting you wise and giving real engineering information, and the right prices for the right goods. Here are a few big ones equipped by me—Photoplay Theatres Company, controlling more than ten theatres, each seating about 2000—ten Simplexes, with "HALLBERG" A. C. to D. C. Economizers and switchboard equipment, and other supplies and specialties—P. E. Besio, Regent Theatre, College Point, L. I., two Powers 6-A's with "HALLBERG" A. C. to D. C. Economizer—H. C. Brown, Lyric Theatre, Summit, N. J., two Simplexes with "HALLBERG" A. C. to D. C. Economizer—Garden Theatre, Elizabeth, N. J., including indoor and Roof Garden, four Powers 6-A's and "HALLBERG" A. C. to D. C. double lamp Economizers—Costello Theatre, N. Y. C., uses two Simplex machines and "HALLBERG" A. C. to D. C. Economizer. 81st St. Theatre on Broadway, two Powers 6-A's. These are just a few, but every one of them speaks a good word for "HALLBERG" quality and engineering advice. It is worth your while to get acquainted; don't let anybody tell you I keep a Drug Store, as one operator told his boss, but the boss told me, and now I get all the boss' business.

I take old machines in trade as part payment for new ones, and I also make liberal allowance on your old rheostats, A. C. Economizers, A. C. to D. C. Converters and Rectifiers in trade for the celebrated "HALLBERG" A. C. to D. C. Economizers, which give the BEST LIGHT with the LEAST CURRENT.

"SLIPPERY SLIM'S DILEMMA" (August 6)—Slippery Slim and Mustang Pete are roommates, also rivals for the hand of the fair Sophie. Slim claims to be a singer and guitar player. Sophie invites them to call, especially asking Slim to bring his guitar. Mustang Pete gets there first and Slim stops beneath the fair Sophie's window and serenades. Next morning Pete awakes first and paints Slim's face. Then he spreads the news that his roommate has smallpox. After a particularly humorous escape from quarantine, Slim proves his immunity, Pete confesses and Sophie returns to her first love—"Slippery Slim."

"BRONCHO BILLY'S FATAL JOKE" (August 8).—Broncho Billy, a prospector, receives an offer of one hundred thousand dollars for his claim. The offer is overheard by Rundell, another prospector, and he proposes to sell his claim also. Broncho Billy hearing of this, plans a joke. He places gold in the blasting hole at Rundell's claim, and when the old prospector blasts he is so delighted at his good fortune that he falls dead from heart failure. Broncho Billy sends a note to Marguerite, Rundell's daughter, telling her the sad fate of her father, and realizing that he was the cause of all the sadness, changes the signs on the claims, she thinking that Broncho Billy's claim belonged to her father. He then notifies the Consolidated Mining Co. that he does not wish to sell. When he sees the girl's sweet face, he falls in love with her.

"THE MOTOR BUCCANEERS" (Special—Two Parts—August 7).—William Nash, an athletic young lawyer, inherits a practice which includes the management of the Gilton Estate. Nash and Gilton are none too friendly, because the young lawyer is anxious for big business, while Gilton is somewhat old fashioned. Nash is entrusted with an envelope for Gilton and locks it in the office safe. Later John Carling, the great financier, calls and gives a sealed envelope into Nash's keeping, to be delivered when a messenger appears with the mysterious pass word. The messenger proves to be Edith Elsden, a beautiful girl. Nash accompanies her to her Uncle's home and meets Lowe and Browdin, two financiers. Later Nash discovers that Carling, the financier, is in reality in Paris and has been impersonated by Keator, a noted crook. Keator appears disguised as Carling, knocks out young Nash and escapes. Nash recovers consciousness, takes Edith and drives to the office, where he finds the safe rifled and Gilton unconscious on the floor. Gilton revives, accuses Nash and falls senseless. Morley, an old bookkeeper, whom Nash inherited with the law practice, enters at this moment and charges Nash with murder.

The night watchman enters and holds Nash for the arrival of the police. Meanwhile Edith is abducted by motor car bandits, who drive her to a shack in the country where the false Carling has been forging railroad proxies. At dawn Nash escapes and hurries to the rescue of Edith. In a terrific hand to hand battle, the young lawyer knocks out the principal buccaneer and forces a confession from Keator. The story is concluded with a thrilling race to the city. Nash arrives just in time to stop the conspiracy to steal a railroad. He saves the day and, best of all, wins Edith for his wife.

"A BIT OF HUMAN DRIFTWOOD" (Two Parts—July 30).—The man's weakness is submerged in the woman's strength and her sacrifice saves him. In the ensuing years the lesson taught him bears its fruit and in maturity his is a noble work—that of giving light to the blind, when, at the height of his new-found happiness, he finds that the sin of his youth has found him out, and then comes despair—darkness.

"THE MAN WHO PAID" (August 1).—When a man sinks to the depths, the saddest part is the misery brought to those who love him most. But should he seize a chance for redemption, therein lies his loved ones' consolation.

EDISON.

A TANGO SPREE (August 3).—The one person in town who did not approve of the tango was Mr. Sparks. It wasn't only that Mr Sparks did not approve of the tango; he abominated it. When girls attempted to buy slippers in his store, he sold them on the provision that they should not be used for the tango. Finding two of his clerks practicing the obnoxious steps, he discharged them on the spot, and his rage upon discovering his butcher practicing a new glide and dip with his assistant resulted in Mr. Sparks getting rather roughly handled.

At just about the time that Mr. Sparks' mother came down to pay her son and daughter-in-law a visit, some people in the village engaged a hall, which Sparks owned, for a small entertainment. When Sparks discovered that the entertainment in question was to be a tango party, he flatly refused to allow his hall to be profaned in any such way. On the evening of the dance Mr. Sparks retired early. He was awakened by one of his boarders, somewhat sketchily disguised as a burglar, threatening him with a patent cigar lighter, the boarder forcing Sparks to give him the key to the hall.

Sparks, suspecting a trick slipped on a dressing gown after the boarder left, and rushed to his beloved hall. Sure enough, it was filled with people dancing. But Sparks' anger was quickly turned to sheer incredulous amazement for the first person he saw dancing was his wife and the second was his dear old mother. Realizing that it was all up, he gracefully surrendered and joined the party.

THE LIVING DEAD (Ninth of the "Man Who Disappeared" Series—August 4).—When John Perriton and Mary Wales fled to Albany to escape her brother, Nelson, and the detective, that amiable young man had set on their track, their first plan was to take the express for Montreal. The fact that Mary recognized her brother and the detective on the train made them realize the futility of attempting to escape across the border. After some thought, they decided that their wisest plan was to return to New York. Accordingly they took one of the steamboats running down the Hudson. Nelson Wales and the detective, after going through Albany with a fine tooth comb, decided that there was no use in looking further. Accordingly, they came aboard the same boat Mary and John had taken.

That night at dinner, Nelson looked across the tables, and saw Perriton and Mary. Filled with triumph, he ordered the detective to arrest the supposed murderer. Perriton, realizing the uselessness of resistance, quietly submitted to being locked up in his stateroom. Mary, whose stateroom was next, racked her brains to think of a way to rescue him. The detective, eager to make assurance doubly sure, stationed himself at John's door, and the situation seemed hopeless. At last, she examined the wall of the stateroom and discovering that the panels were fastened in place with screws.

Inspired by a gleam of hope, she unscrewed one of the panels. John crawled through the gap. Affairs were improved, but still almost hopeless. But Mary's quick brain met the difficulty. Under her directions, John waited until she had left the stateroom, and then cautiously followed. Just as she came opposite to the detective and her brother, Mary pretended to faint. They naturally rushed to her assistance, and in the moment they did so, John shot past them, and rushing to the stern of the boat, jumped overboard. After a long, hard swim, he reached shore in an exhausted condition. Mary, on the boat, had been unable to see whether or not he reached the bank. She feared the worst, however, and her joy may be imagined, when John Perriton, safe and sound, came to her in New York.

A CHANGE OF BUSINESS (August 5).—The Widow Robinson was a person of very strict habits and tastes. She had Conscientious Scruples. Accordingly, she was very careful about the sort of people she met. If they were not Perfectly Respectable, they were absolutely Taboo as far as she was concerned. Hence when Mrs. Winslow, whom the widow was visiting, attempted to present Saloon-keeper Jones to her, the Widow tilted her chin until it made an angle of 45 degrees with her cervical vertebrae, and directed a fixed and awful stare at a spot some distance above the head of the unfortunate Jones.

A few days later, Jennie, the widow's little daughter, ran away from her little playmates, and entered Jones' saloon. With a savoir faire, remarkable in one so young, she advanced to the bar and demanded a drink. After his first moment of surprise, Jones filled a goblet with icy cold milk and gave it to her. Meanwhile, the widow had discovered that Jennie was missing. Wild with alarm, she aroused the neighbors, and instituted a search throughout the vicinity. When a gentleman who "had just happened to drop into the saloon" informed the widow where her daughter was, the poor woman nearly fainted. The thought that a daughter of hers had deliberately entered such a place was almost unbearable.

After she had rescued Jennie from the saloon, the widow was forced to listen to numerous encomiums on her daughter's part in praise of Saloon-keeper Jones. Almost unconsciously, the child's praises influenced her, and she found herself half wishing that he were in some more reputable business. For his part, Jones decided that he could not possibly get along without the widow. As the most obvious course of winning her, he sold out his saloon, and opened a drug store. And so it happened, when he advertised for an assistant, the widow at once applied for the place.

FAINT HEART NE'ER WON FAIR LADY (August 5).—Billie did not look it, but he was of the stuff of which the heroes of old were made. Speak, if you will, of Tristan and Isolde, of Dante and Beatrice, of Paolo and Francesca, but speak also of Billie and Nellie, for never did lover of old suffer more than he to win the lady of his heart. Nellie's father was Billie's employer, and he cared less than nothing for Billie as a son-in-law. When the young man had the effrontery to ask him for his daughter's hand, Mr. Bailey promptly discharged him. Before he left the office, Billie placed a paper on Mr. Bailey's desk, repeating his request. Shortly afterward, he sent Mr. Bailey a telegram with the same prayerful words: "I love your daughter. Will you let me marry her?"

Mr. Bailey's temper, at no time of the best, was seriously impaired by Billie's insolence. When Billie met him as he was leaving his office, and again made his modest demand, Bailey was so much enraged that he pushed him down the elevator shaft. Billie, a little the worse for his fall, met him at the foot of the stairs. Mr. Bailey, frightened by such inhuman persistence, fled. Billie followed. In the excitement of the race, neither noticed where he was going, and as a consequence both were struck by an automobile.

In the hospital to which they were taken, Billie again begged Mr. Bailey for his daughter's hand. Mr. Bailey promptly left the hospital. That night, when Mr. Bailey, covered with bandages, came down to dinner, and discovered Billie at the table, he, for one wild moment, considered the feasibility of strangling the young man and burying him in the back yard. But the sight of Billie's woe-begone and plaster-covered face, proved too much for Mr. Bailey, so, making the best of a bad bargain he gave him Nellie and his blessing.

THE PRESIDENT'S SPECIAL (Special—Two Parts—August 7).—John Farley and his wife were in very comfortable circumstances. They owned their own little farm and, as a result, were able to live very nicely on John's income as a railroad switchman, and to put money in the bank as well. The one great drawback to the farm, was the fact that it was so far from the tower in which John worked. Tired out from his long day's work, John was frequently nearly exhausted when he had finished the long walk home. As a surprise to her husband, Mrs. Farley one day took the money she had saved up, and bought a second-hand automobile. After that, John Farley always rode to and from his work.

One day, a note was brought to Farley telling him that Flood the other operator, was sick, and unable to go on duty. Farley sent word to his wife that he would not be able to come home, and settled down for an additional eight hours on his station. Just as Mrs. Farley came down to bring her husband his dinner, a message came over the wire directing Farley to sidetrack train No. 49 in order to make way for the President's Special. Before she left, Farley happened to mention to his wife that No. 49 had been chartered for a picnic party.

After his wife had gone, the overworked Farley fell asleep. He was awakened by the roar of a passing train—No. 49. It was too late to do anything, and the agonized man realized that nothing could prevent a terrible catastrophe. Mrs. Farley, at home, saw the passing train, noticed the children waving flags, and in a moment of utter horror, realized what had happened. There was only one thing to do.

Jumping into the automobile, she raced after the flying train. A long road lay alongside of the railroad track, and down this she tore, the little automobile straining every fibre to overhaul its gigantic rival.

Meanwhile John, out of his senses with the horror of it all, paced up and down the switch tower, picturing the terrible scene which must result when the two fast trains met each other in head-on collision. But the miracle happened. Nellie reached a crossing before the excursion train, and forced it to stop. Acting on her frenzied commands, the engineer backed the train down to the siding just in time. The President's Special tore by and Nellie rushed in to carry a message of incredulous joy to the crazed man inside the switch tower.

ONE TOUCH OF NATURE (August 8).—Mr. Bradley had a very serious case of nerves. The cares and worries of his tremendous business interests reacted on his disposition to such an extent that he stayed in a perpetual state of ill nature. Everything seemed to go wrong, and nothing whatever pleased him. One day, Mr. Bradley set out to keep a business engagement, in his automobile. The car broke down on a lonely country road, and Mr. Bradley, after telling the chauffeur exactly what he thought of him, decided to walk the balance of the distance.

After he had taken out a portion of his spleen on a wasps' nest, with somewhat unforseen results, Mr. Bradley lost his way. After wandering about for some time, he met Freckles. Freckles was sitting beside a stream fishing. When Mr. Bradley angrily demanded that he be set upon his proper road at once, Freckles commanded him to keep back from the bank, lest he spoil the fishing. Mr. Bradley's wild anger was suddenly quieted by the sudden catching of a fish on Freckles' part. Interested in spite of himself, he settled down to watch the boy. Then, waxing enthusiastic, he cut himself a pole, and started to fish, too.

The long and short of it all was that Mr. Bradley forgot all about his business engagement and settled down to a real outing with Freckles. They cooked their fish, and ate them with berries gathered by Freckles; they played mumbley-peg; and, finally, when the sun grew hot, went in swimming. The freedom and carelessness of it all wrought a miraculous change in Mr. Bradley. The frayed irritability of his ruffled nerves was smoothed out as though by a hot iron. So when night came on, he sent Freckles to Mrs. Bradley with a note telling her that he thought he would stay out in the woods for a few days. "Perhaps," he concluded, "It may improve my temper." Mrs. Bradley smiled curiously when she read her husband's letter. When Bradley awoke next morning, he was surprised to find himself wrapped in a blanket. Not far away, Mrs. Bradley, wrapped in another blanket, was sleeping on the ground. When she awoke, she informed her husband that she thought the best thing to do was for both of them to stay out there for a month.

THE LAD FROM OLD IRELAND (August 1).—The glorious blue skies and the green fields of County Cork have no beauties for Terry. Filled with the fire and ambition of youth, he dreams of the fame and fortune to be won in America. Aileen is filled with grief when her sweetheart informs her of his plan to leave for the United States. Despite her pleas, Terry leaves the "Ould Sod" for the new world. The lad from old Ireland secures a position the day following his arrival at New York.

As time passes, the pressure of his work causes the memory of Aileen to grow dim in Terry's thoughts. Back in County Cork, the colleen waits in vain for word from her sweetheart. Poverty lays its heavy hand upon Aileen. Her mother's illness and death leave her in sore financial straits. Unable to pay the rent of her humble cottage, the maid is threatened with eviction.

Word of Aileen's plight comes to Terry just as the lad is elected mayor of the city. Filled with remorse, Terry turns his back upon his society friends—and the heiress who would be his for the asking—and boards a steamer for Ireland. He comes not a moment too soon. Even as he reaches the thatched cottage which has long been Aileen's home, Terry sees the worn furniture being carried out. Filled with rage, the lad enters Aileen's home and confronts the landlord who is berating the colleen because of her failure to pay the rent. Terry thrusts the money into the man's hand and helps him on his way with his good right foot. The following Sunday finds the banns announcing the approaching marriage of Terry and his sweetheart read by the parish priest.

THE VAMPIRE'S TRAIL (Special—Two Parts—August 3).—With the birth of her son, Laura's affection for her husband is submerged in her mother-love for the child. Deprived of his wife's companionship, Horace drifts away from her. The man falls into the toils of Rita, an actress.

The woman loves Dugan, a reporter on a yellow sheet. Dugan suggests that Rita elope with Horace as a means of getting publicity. The unscrupulous woman agrees. Horace falls into Rita's net and the two plan to elope upon the occasion of a reception given by Laura, which is to be held a few days later.

Laura is amazed to find the notorious actress among her guests, upon the night of the affair. Shortly afterward, a frightened maid informs the hostess that her child is ill. All the guests depart, with the exception of Rita, who waits for Horace. A doctor declares that Laura's baby has a severe case of diphtheria and the house is quarantined.

Rita is furious when she discovers she cannot leave the house. Enraged by the collapse of her infamous scheme, the woman reveals her true self to Horace. Thinking of the little wife who is fighting for their child's life, Horace turns from Rita in disgust.

Several nights later, Dugan, impatient for news, steals to the rear of the house. Evading the police on guard, he attracts Rita's attention. Laura comes upon the two and learns what her neglect of Horace has brought about. She confronts the actress, who shrinks in fear from the enraged wife. Thus Horace finds them.

Falling to his knees, the husband acknowledges his baseness and begs to be forgiven. But Laura, taking him in her arms, declares the fault to have been her own.

THE CHIEF OF POLICE (August 4).—Discovering a man burglarizing the safe in his library, Franklin captures him by a clever ruse. Shrewdly sizing the thief up as a novice in crime, the captor suggests that the burglar relate the circumstances which drove him to burglary.

Breaking down, Keenan, the burglar, consents. According to his story, he had been sent to prison, although innocent, on the charge of robbing his employer. After spending four years in prison, the real culprit was discovered and Keenan secured his release.

Continuing, the man tells of how he found his wife and child in dire poverty. Applying for his old position, he was informed that his prison term made him undesirable as an employee. Keenan then tried to secure other jobs, but detectives invariably traced him and by informing his employers that he was an ex-convict, caused his discharge. Driven to desperation by want, Keenan determined to prey upon society. His effort to burglarize Franklin's home was his first attempt at crime.

Franklin regards Keenan with a peculiar smile when the man finishes his story. Despite the thief's pleas, his captor summons the police and has Keenan taken away.

The following morning, Keenan is taken before the chief of police—and finds himself confronting Franklin. Dazed by the discovery, Keenan hears the chief declare that an investigation has proved his story to be true. Continuing, Franklin declares he has long sought for a private secretary who could be of aid to him in his sociological work. Believing his prison experience has well fitted him for the position, the chief of police offers it to Keenan. Filled with happiness, the ex-convict accepts.

THE OPERATOR AT BLACK ROCK (Special—Two Parts—August 5).—One hundred thousand dollars carried in the express car of train No. 3 is the prize sought by Gregg and his band of outlaws. Two of the gang board the train at the yard, while the rest of the band hide along the track near Black Rock, where the holdup is to take place.

Gregg and his lieutenant enter the telegraph station at Black Rock and bind Ruth, the operator, to her chair, to prevent her from telegraphing word of the holdup. Later, due to Gregg's carelessness, the telegraph station catches fire.

The holdup is successfully perpetrated. Tom, Ruth's sweetheart, is the express messenger. Realizing what has occurred the boy bolts the door of the express car. A moment later, a bullet stuns him. The outlaws compel the train crew and passengers to descend. A leaky throttle in the locomotive causes the train to start. Before the desperadoes can leap aboard, the train has run wild.

By extraordinary ingenuity, Ruth manages to send a message over the wires with her teeth. Sheriff Storm and his posse are immediately rushed to the scene, while a locomotive is dispatched to head the runaway off. The Sheriff rescues Ruth from the blaze in the nick of time.

The baffled outlaws flee with the posse close behind. The desperadoes take refuge in a cabin and a battle ensues. Gregg makes his escape when the posse closes in on the gang. Storm follows the man. Coming to a cliff, Gregg forces his horse to leap off, landing in the river fifty feet below. Undaunted, Storm follows and captures the outlaw.

The runaway train is overhauled and brought to a stop. Tom revives and, opening the door of the express car, reports what has occurred.

DON'T MONKEY WITH THE BUZZ SAW (August 7).—Between the nagging of his wife and the bullying of his mother-in-law, poor Henpeck leads an awful life. His grief overcomes him one evening and the man stop into a liquor emporium to drown his troubles. Wife and mother-in-law are waiting for Henpeck upon his return several hours later. What happens to poor hubby speedily sobers him up.

Discovering that Professor Orbs, a hypnotist, is his neighbor, Henpeck induces the man to teach him the science. So well does he absorb the lessons that several nights later, Henpeck causes his wife and mother-in-law to fall into a slumber just as they finish supper.

Stealing from the house, hubby meets Bunt, a chum. The men meet a couple of chorus girls and proceed to have a hilarious time. Aided by his hypnotic powers, Henpeck is enabled to get away from home every evening.

A burglar enters the house during one of Henpeck's excursions. The thief is seen by Professor Orbs, who summons an officer. The two men enter and capture the crook. Discovering that Mrs. Henpeck and her mother remain motionless during the struggle, the hypnotist investigates and ascertains the cause. He breaks the spell.

The ladies learn of Henpeck's scheme and plan his downfall. When hubby attempts his usual stunt the following night, the two pretend to succumb. When Henpeck leaves the house, however, his wife and her mother are close behind. They see him meet Bunt and the chorus girls.

The enraged pair follow Henpeck to a lobster palace. Mrs. Henpeck sees her worse half place his arms about the chorus girl and kiss her. Unable to restrain her wrath, she descends upon luckless Henpeck and drags him home by the ear.

GREY EAGLE'S REVENGE (August 8).—Chaplain Scott, whose kindness wins for him the love of the Indians, loses his heart to Naturich, daugher of Chief Grey Eagle. The chaplain later learns that the maid loves Lieutenant French.

A distorted sense of humor causes one of the soldiers to hurl Chief Grey Eagle into a stream. Enraged, the red-skin turns upon his tormentor and stabs him. Returning to his camp, Chief Grey Eagle meets the chaplain, to whom he tells the story.

The kindly minister hastens to the fort, where he finds Col. Thorne, the commandant, dispatching a force to place the chief under arrest. Unable to alter the commandant's decision, Chaplain Scott returns to the Indian encampment and induces Grey Eagle to submit to arrest.

The chief is roughly handled in being taken to the fort. Word of the treatment accorded Grey Eagle reaches the tribe and they threaten to take to the warpath. Realizing the seriousness of the situation, Col. Thorne heeds Scott's advice and releases the Indian.

Furious at the manner in which he had been treated, the redskin resolves to lead his tribe in an attack upon the soldiers. Learning of this, the chaplain rides toward the Indian encampment to turn Grey Eagle from his purpose. The chief sees the chaplain approaching. Failing to recognize his friend, the redskin shoots and slays him.

Discovering his awful blunder, Grey Eagle resolves to expiate his crime. Seeing the soldiers approaching, he deliberately draws their fire. The next moment, the Indian chief topples across the body of his white friend.

GEORGE KLEINE.

WHEN WAR THREATENS (Special—Two-Part—August 4).—Richard Hyde, a spy in the pay of a foreign power, wins the heart and hand of pretty Winifred Colburn, daughter of Admiral Colburn, commander-in-chief of the navy. He is jubilant over his conquest, not only because of the triumph of his love affair, but also because war is threatening between the two nations and he feels that his position as the son-in-law of the admiral will place him in a position to secure important navy department secrets without much difficulty.

Amart, the Admiral's orderly, however, is suspicious of Hyde from the first, probably largely because of his fondness for Lieutenant Tom Shelley, an unsuccessful suitor for Winifred's hand. He soon becomes convinced of the spy's treachery and lays a trap to catch him in the act of betraying department secrets.

Winifred, meanwhile, misunderstands Hyde's secret meetings with a woman confederate, and, while in search of evidence of what she believes to be his faithlessness to her, finds a cipher letter in his pocket. Suspecting it to be a love missive, she turns it over to Shelley, who is an expert at deciphering codes of various kinds, for translation. Missing the letter, Hyde attacks his wife when he learns she has made away with it, and shoots and seriously wounds Shelley when the latter interferes. As he was in his own house when the shot was fired, he claims that Shelley was trespassing and succeeds in making his story believed in court.

Soon, however, the spy walks unsuspectingly into the trap laid by Amart, who, by tapping the telephone wires, has learned the location of the spies' headquarters. When government agents raid the place, they find Hyde in the act of accepting a large sum of money in payment for a set of new battleship plans which he is about to deliver to the country's enemies. In the meantime, Shelley has translated the code letter, which contains matter clinching Hyde's guilt. Seeing himself caught, he fires a bullet into his own brain, leaving Winifred free to marry the faithful young lieutenant.

SELIG.

ETIENNE OF THE GLAD HEART (Special—Two Parts—August 3).—Etienne Cloquet, a young woodsman, is in love with Marie, the pretty daughter of Paul Le Groux, a salmon fisher. Etienne has such a sunny disposition that he has become generally known as "Etienne of the Glad Heart." Notwithstanding his sunny disposition, he has a fierce temper when aroused, so that those who know him realize that it will not do to press him too far. The plans for the marriage of the young couple have all been arranged, and Etienne goes to the lumber camp to put in a final winter with the expectation that he will have enough money saved in the spring so that he and Marie can marry.

Olaf, a young trapper, is a handsome fellow, but unscrupulous. He chances on to the cabin of Paul, and becomes a boarder with the family. Naturally, he is attracted by Marie, and realizing her engagement to Etienne, plans to gain her affections. One of Etienne's accomplishments is the playing of the guitar, and it has been his custom to carry this instrument with him when he visited his sweetheart. They discover that Olaf is even a superior performer on the guitar, and Marie begins to show an interest in him as a result of his pleasant ways and musical skill. During Etienne's absence in the lumber camp Olaf makes progress in the winning of Marie, her parents being unsuspicious of the change in her affections. While Etienne is in the lumber camp he rescues an Indian named Peter from a terrible death, and Peter has become his faithful friend. Peter accompanies Etienne on his return from the lumber camp. Just about the time of Etienne's return, old Paul becomes suspicious of Marie, and discovers her in the act of sewing a tiny garment, which confirms his suspicions that there is something wrong. Paul demands the attendance of Etienne, believing him to be the culprit, and wishing to bring him face to face with the disgraced girl. At the cabin door, they meet Olaf returning from a trapping trip. They face Marie and Paul commands that his daughter shall name her betrayer. Marie is overwhelmed with shame, and does not speak. Etienne, to whom the information is wholly new, at once grasps the situation, and springing upon Olaf, endeavors to kill him with his bare hands. Marie's mother intervenes and saves Olaf's life. The disgraced girl is driven from home, accompanied by Olaf, her betrayer.

The home-like cabin of Paul becomes a place of sorrow. Etienne has lost his spirit, and one night he takes his beloved guitar into the woods and hides it. Peter, believing that Etienne will once more be happy, rescues the guitar and takes it to the cabin, unknown to Etienne. The love of the mother impels her to urge Etienne to undertake a search for Marie. She misses her only child, and her heart yearns for her. She has not had word of her for months, and does not know whether Marie be alive or dead. Etienne consults with his friend Peter, and it is finally decided that a search shall be made for the outcast girl.

Peter finally locates the cabin in which Olaf and Marie are living. He accompanies Etienne to the place, and they find the couple inside. Olaf's heartless and brutal treatment of Marie enrages Etienne, but Peter restrains him. They watch the cabin in secret until Olaf goes for an inspection of his traps. Then they hurriedly enter the cabin, urge the overjoyed girl to escape under their protection and the three hasten away and embark in Peter's canoe for the return trip. They are going to take Marie back home. Olaf returns unexpectedly to the cabin a short time after their departure. He notes the absence of Marie and cannot understand it. His skill in woodcraft discloses the tracks of Marie and her two companions, and he follows the trail to the river. There he notes the marks which show that another canoe has been hauled up at the landing. Furious with rage, he springs into his canoe, and follows with all the haste and speed that his skill can supply. Down the winding river he follows the heavily loaded canoe containing the girl and her two friends. Etienne and Peter are also experts at the battle, but the added weight in their canoe renders their progress slower than that of their frantic pursuer. Olaf finally gets within range, and pulling his six-shooter, he empties it at the occupants of the canoe. They proceed uninjured, and throwing the now useless weapon away, he continues to paddle after them. The leading canoe is propelled to the shore, and Marie and Etienne disembark in haste.

Olaf drifts past undecided as to what his next step shall be, but Peter, realizing what the friendship of Etienne means to him and what the despicable acts of Olaf in connection with Marie have meant to his friend, he dashes after Olaf, and upon arriving along side, he launches himself like a catapult on the shoulders of the doomed Olaf, upsetting the canoe, and both floundering into the ice cold stream. Peter returns alone. The anxious mother accepts the return of Marie with all of a mother's love. Gruff old Paul accepts the situation, while Etienne, with the sunshine once more in his heart, accepts his rescued guitar from the grinning Peter, and happy hearts beat once again.

THE ORDEAL (August 4).—Paul is a young hospital surgeon and Esther is a lovely nurse. She has fallen in love with Paul, although he is engaged to Miriam Burke. While walking on the pier at a seashore resort, a little child falls into the water. Paul refuses to spring into the water or attempt to save he child, this office being performed by another man. Miriam calls Paul a coward and returns her engagement ring scornfully. Upon his return to the hospital where Esther is employed as a nurse, Paul tells her everything. He explains that he is not really a coward, but does not know how to swim. His viewpoint was that had he sprung into the water, he merely would have sacrificed his own life, or made it necessary for someone else to save him. This he did not consider would be heroic. Esther agrees with him.

Mrs. Burke, the mother of Miriam, is brought to the hospital for an operation. Miriam comes with her. Dr. Gunn, assisted by Paul, together with Esther and another nurse, are engaged in the operation, when the hospital takes fire. The time when the fire broke out was a critical period in the operation. To move the patient would mean certain death. Dr. Gunn continues heroically at his work. The smoke blinded him. The other nurses flee when the roaring flames threaten to engulf them. When the doctor fails, Paul insists that Esther shall lead him and Miriam to safety, and he will continue. Esther returns through the smoke and flames to be by Paul's side. Together they battle to save Miriam's mother's life, until at last the operation is successfully concluded. Esher and Paul stagger through the hall carrying the unconscious patient, and the party is saved.

Paul slowly recovers from his burns. Esther and he are fellow patients. She persuades the nurse to wheel her in her chair to the bedside of Paul, and there she kneels by his side. There is a pretty love scene. The door opens softly and Miriam tiptoes into the room, her face aglow with love for Paul, her hero. Paul and Esther do not hear her enter the room, and Miriam realizes that she is intruding. She recognizes the fact that Paul can never be anything to her, as he is evidently deeply in love with Esther. Miriam closes the door and withdraws.

THE REPORTER ON THE CASE (August 5).—Reporter Jimmie was gloomy. There had been nothing doing in the way of news worth his while as a star writer, for a week, and he carried a grouch. Nothing worth while appeared in the morning "extras," so after sticking around the office for a while, he decided to visit his old friend, Detective Barnes. Here he found that Dame Fortune had opened the door for him.

In the meantime, Giles, heavy jowled and villainous in appearance, and looking as if he owed the whole world a grudge, finished his prison term and came back home. He was broke. He decided to raise some money; so he prepared himself by lighting his lamp, loading his revolver and writing a note. The note he thrust under the door of Emery's house. The note warned Emery to come across with money, and if not, Giles would give the papers an interesting story and a convict photograph of him. Mrs. Emery found the note when she opened the door, and read it. Emery was sick abed, so his wife, guessing at once who had written the blackmailing note, went through the darkness to where Giles was stopping. Mrs. Emery carried a loaded pistol with her. Giles, in his pleasant way, took away her money, but declared that it was not sufficient. Then she gave him her jewelry. This nearly satisfied him, but he wanted her wedding ring also. Mrs. Emery would not part with her wedding ring without a struggle. A lively tussle for the ring followed. The policeman on the beat heard a shot. In the house he found Giles dead on the floor from a bullet wound. He telephoned to police headquarters of his discovery.

Jimmie had just seated himself for a chat with Detective Barnes when the telephone message came. They visited the scene of the crime and found clues, among which were the initials on the jewelry, which led them to Mrs. Emery. Anticipating a visit from the police, the clever woman was prepared for them. She explained the jewelry saying that the house had been robbed the night before. Giles was a burglar by reputation, and the significance was unmistakable. But Mrs. Emery overlooked one thing—Jimmy found her wedding ring clutched in Giles' hand. He made Mrs. Emery confess her visit, although she denied the shooting. Detective Barnes insisted on arresting Mrs. Emery, but Jimmy begged for twenty-four hours' time in which to clear up the mystery. How he cleverly did this is unmistakably shown in the last scenes. An entirely new and fascinating situation is developed while Jimmie, as usual, triumphs.

THE SKULL AND THE CROWN (August 7).—Dr. Loring is the jovial head of an insane asylum. His particular friend, Jack, calls one day to present a curiosity in the form of a peculiarly shaped skull. Jack takes a stroll through the corridors, and during his absence Betty, the doctor's niece, enters the office. Betty has secured the regal robes of a queen to wear at a masquerade. With natural curiosity she notes the skull on the doctor's table and asks about it. The doctor, being in a jovial mood, and feeling free to play a joke on his friend, tells Betty that the skull belongs to one of the inmates, who fancies himself to be Hamlet. When Betty leaves the office, she forgets her crown; so when Jack returns, he asks the doctor who owns the ornament. The doctor sees an opportunity for furthering the jest; so he informs Jack that the crown belongs to a patient who fancies herself to be the Queen of Navarre. Jack feels sorry for the poor girl and suggests that he would like to meet her, unless she is too insane. The doctor falls into the plan very nicely and later, when Betty comes back in search of her crown, she expresses the desire to see the poor young man who fancies he is Hamlet.

The wily doctor arranges a meeting in the reception room, and each one endeavors to play the assigned part with due fidelity because the doctor explained that either one would become violent if it were apparent that the other might be pretending. The scene in the reception room is a particularly ludicrous one. "Hamlet" plays his part with a full measure of insanity injected, and the force of the scene frightens the bogus queen, who flees in dismay. On the following day Jack and Betty meet on the public street. Each believes the other to have escaped from the asylum, and following the doctor's instructions, each plays the part assigned. The police arrest them, and they are taken to the station. The desk sergeant telephones the asylum for the padded wagon, in which they ride in consternation in to the presence of Dr. Loring, who explains the joke with great gusto, but to their comical dismay.

THE JUNGLE SAMARITAN (August 11).—When Prentice died, his widow and her oldest daughter, Elouise, were forced to find comfort in the little fund that he left for their support. Donald, the widow's stepson, sensitive to the fact that his rough clothes and plodding ways were not agreeable to them, left to become a wanderer, and little Helen, the younger daughter, crept away to her darkened room and cried—but Donald did not know this. He joined an animal-hunting expedition and became lost in the African wilds. One day he found his way blocked by a lion. His gun wounded the charging beast, and the second bullet laid it low. Later a leopard, resenting the human intrusion, leaped upon him before he cound draw his weapon. A terrible strugele ensued in which the man finally choked the snarling, raging beast into insensibility with his bare hands. Then a great wave of pity surged through Donald's heart. He took the animal to his hut, nursed it back to health, and thereafter they were daily companions in the hunt.

During his absence a smooth stranger induced Mrs. Prentice to invest all her funds in a crazy project. Then Donald returned, and through a peculiar and dramatic manner made the adventurer refund the money to Mrs. Prentice. The stepmother and her daughter were delighted to have the luxuries of life again, so much so that they forgot to welcome Donald as a member of the family after he had saved them, and he again turned his back upon the old home, and was about to wander away, heavy-hearted and alone. It was then that he heard a soft voice calling his name, and he turned to see Helen with outstretched arms. "Are you going to leave me again?" she asked with a sob. Amazed, but delighted, that his secret love for her was reciprocated, Donald took her in his arms and then they turned and walked away together down the long road to happiness.

CARMELITA'S REVENGE (August 8).—Jack Furth, a young civil engineer, and Jane Ross, a beautiful New York girl, are engaged. His employers send him to Mexico to inspect the mines of Jose Fernanz. He bids Jane good-bye, and upon arriving in Mexico he accepts the hospitality of Fernanz. Carmelita is the dark-eyed, impulsive and beautiful daughter of Fernanz. Manual, a sprightly young Mexican, wooes Carmelita, but she has been attracted by the engaging personality of Jack, and discourages the affections of Manual. Carmelita loses her heart to Jack, but he does not reciprocate. He has thoughts only for Jane. Manual becomes fiercely jealous, but Carmelita does not heed him.

When Jack's work in Mexico is finished, he returns to New York without a thought more than a friendly regard for the beautiful senorita. Jack marries Jane and they live happily. Life seems all sunshine and roses to them. When a lovely little baby came to their home, they thought their happiness was complete. Carmelita was inconsolable. Her spirit of unrest prompted her father to take her with him to New York on a business trip. There she meets Jack face to face. Her violent passion causes her to plot the death of her successful rival. She sends Jack a decoy telephone message, causing him to leave home for an hour. Seeing him leave the house, Carmelita obtains admission, and stealthily makes her way to the room occupied by mother and child.

In the meantime, Jane had been startled by a cry from the child. Hurrying to its assistance, she found it in the throes of a violent attack of croup. Her inexperience renders her helpless to relieve it. Carmelita steals into the room and prepares to deal the blow, which will result fatally for Jane. In her anguish, Jane wheels about and observes her. Her only thought is for the safety of her child. She appeals to Carmelita to save the baby. Then Carmelita is torn between two passions—one of vengeance, one to make Jack happy. Her better impulses win, and she seizes the child, directing Jane to hasten for a doctor. Their united efforts save the child. Jack returns home and is amazed at the explanation of Jane, who credits Carmelita with having saved the child. Carmelita returns to her Mexican home. Manual again enters the lists, and is finally successful in winning her hand even if not her heart.

"A FATAL CARD" (August 4).—Judge Holder, a police magistrate, has an occasional thirst; and he also likes an occasional game of poker. He is indulging in both of these vices in a back room of Jake's place. At the time his thirst has been pretty well assuaged, he gets into a scrap with Green about the game. Green loses his temper and chokes him, but Smith and Brown separate the men. In maudlin sentimentality, the Judge gives Smith a Jack of Diamonds to be presented in token of his debt; then a policeman leads the Judge home and all the others present make a rush to get a Jack of some sort against an hour of need.

Next morning the Judge remembers having given a card but does not remember to whom he gave it. He catches Jack Drake kissing his daughter, Bess, and refuses his consent to their engagement but changes his mind when Jack flashes a card. On his way to court the Judge has several encounters, each terminating in the flashing of a card by a most unlikely person. He is pretty well riled by the time he gets on the bench. The first prisoner brought in is Smith who has been arrested for fighting. Smith is the only man who lawfully holds a card but he is a bit too late. The Judge sentences him to a ten-day term and when Smith starts to argue, the Judge knocks him out with his gavel, and the unfortunate Smith is dragged to durance vile.

"HE WOKE UP IN TIME" (August 4).—Hans finds it rather tiresome reading a novel so curls up on a park bench and takes a nap. He dreams that he is sleeping in the woods and is aroused by the talk of a gang of train robbers who have just held up the express car and have a whole chest of gold. Arming himself with a club he dashes off in the direction of the law breakers and, with lion hearted courage, kills the entire gang and makes off with the money. He ties his trouser legs at the bottom so that he can take the money he cannot carry in his pockets.

Down the road he meets his old crony, Jake, and they go off together to spend the money. Jake picks up the coin that Hans cannot conveniently carry. They invest in full dress suits and call on a charming lady, drawing on themselves the wrath of a French count and his friend the baron. There is a duel and by stratagem they are getting the better of it, when a cowardly friend of the count throwh a stone and knocks Hans out. The count and the baron then proceed to stick him in the ribs. Hans wakes up to find that the swords are really the clubs of two policemen who warn him not to go to sleep again. Jake, too, comes along and takes up an old grudge he has harbored against Hans, and begins to let out his wrath. It is not long before the two tramps are arrested and taken to jail.

THE MAN WITH A FUTURE (Special—Two Parts—August 5).—Ann Trevor, daughter of a confirmed old crook known to the police as "Dad," rebels at the life of dishonesty she is accustomed to, and her father agrees that Ann shall lead a straight life. In announcing this, Dad angers Dick Dickson, his accomplice, who wishes to marry Ann. The three set forth to perform the last burglary in which Ann is to have a part. The trio is surprised by the police. Dad and Dick are captured. Ann, desperately wounded, escapes. She is found by Henry Scott, a physician, on the latter's front stoop. Henry saves Ann's life by an operation and promises to keep her secret. He is impressed by her sincerity and determines to assist her. Henry's friend, John Grayson, district attorney, becomes enamored of Ann during his frequent calls at Henry's home, and proposes marriage. Ann holds him off until she can ask Henry's advice. Henry conceals his own love for the girl and urges her to seek happiness in marriage with John.

Ann's married life progresses happily. When her little son is two years old, Dad and Dick are released after having served their terms. Dad is in ill health. Soon he and Dick, hard pressed for funds, plan another burglary. They are suspected by detectives and "Runt" Hollins, a stool pigeon, is sent to spy on them. Dick, passing Ann's home by chance, sees her enter her carriage with her child. Dick hurries to tell Dad he has discovered Ann's whereabouts. Dad vehemently prohibits Dick from annoying Ann in any way. Dick leaves and goes to Ann's home and demands money of the terrified young mother. Ann grants the request. The next day, fearful for the future, she goes to the crooks' headquarters to plead with Dick to stay away from her home. After a pathetic reunion with Dad, she tells him of Dick's actions. In the midst of this scene Dick arrives, followed by Runt, the stool pigeon. Ann is concealed in a secret closet. Dick and Runt quarrel and Dick kills the stool pigeon. The police arrive to find Dad alone with the dead body of Runt. Dad is arrested on suspicion. When the officers leave, Ann, terrified, emerges from her place of concealment, having witnessed the whole affair. Ann guards her secret, fearful lest her evidence in behalf of her father will expose her past and wreck her married life. Her husband, John, prepares to prosecute Dad for the murder of the stool pigeon. Ann goes to Henry for advice. Both then go to Dad's cell, where Ann pleads with her father to be allowed to testify in his behalf. He steadfastly refuses. Meanwhile John has seen Henry and Ann quite often together. He suspects unfaithfulness on Ann's part. On the day the trial is under way, Dick, driven desperate by hunger, risks another call on Ann for funds. Ann, in terror, fights him off. Dick is killed by a patrolman while escaping. In the midst of the trial Ann staggers into the courtroom and before the eyes of her dumbfounded husband, she bares her entire past in giving the evidence that frees Dad. The sudden shock is too great for Dad, in his weakened condition, and the old criminal dies in his daughter's arms. Henry enters with news that the real murderer has been killed. John cannot hold out against the pathetic appeal of his young wife for his former love, and he freely forgives her.

"A SIREN OF THE DESERT" (August 7).—On adjoining homesteads on the edge of the desert lived Roy Webster and his intended bride, May Mason. May had prepared her gown but longed for a veil, and Roy was persuaded to make a journey to the town in search of the desired article. In a typical dance hall, a woman known as the Desert Siren charmed the miners and cattlemen. There Roy met her. Unskilled in the ways of the world he fell a victim of the woman's fascination but resisted the spell and rode away from town only to be drawn back again. His frequent visits to town aroused in May's mind the suspicion that he had acquired a passion for gambling and she induced her father to follow Roy. The father learned the truth and returning to his daughter was unable to prevent her reading in his face the real reason for the frequent absences of her lover.

Soon afterward news of a rich gold strike in another region reached the town, and there followed a mad rush for the new "diggings." The town was practically deserted and Bellerin Blake with his outfit of girls and gamblers was among the leaders. At the water hole where the stampeders camped the first night a fight broke out over the Siren and Monte Culbert, the gambler, lost his life. The uproar terrified the Siren so that she rushed in a panic away from the water hole. All night she wandered until she dropped exhausted. Meanwhile May, seeking to forget her misery, rode out into the desert. She came upon the unconscious Desert Siren and putting her on her horse hurried home. Roy, going to town again to see the Siren, found everything deserted and returned disconsolate. Passing May's house he decided to stop and visit her and entered just in time to find the Siren restored to consciousness. In the recognition between Roy and the Siren May found her worst suspicions confirmed. Bursting into tears she rushed out of the house throwing herself sobbing on the ground outside. Left alone in the house with Roy, the Siren demanded to know the reason for the other woman's tears. Roy explained but urged that his passion for her was stronger than his old love for May. Despite her life there still existed within the heart of the Desert Siren a spark of true womanhood which would not let her be the means of separating the lovers. Realizing that Roy's attachment for her was not lasting she bared her life and shattered his illusions. Then taking him by the hand she leads him outside and restores him to the girl, herself shrinking quietly out of the background and out of the lives of the two reunited lovers.

noyed by the worst of the town's pests, viz., Percy Montmorency. He follows her to her home, but he is made to leave by her father's unseeming mirth. Chief Smaltz, head of Baconrine's crew of conflagration exterminators and incendiary nemesis, inspects his motley crowd and leaves to seek amusement. He observes Eileen and being a suitor for her fair lunch-grabber, stops for a short chat of several hours and repairs to his domicile to refresh the inner man with much fodder. Percy, becoming peeved at his many rebuffs, etc., liquors up at the town emporium of refreshments and then gets devilish and smokes three successive cigarettes, nonchalantly tossing one into an assortment of debris. Said action causes a fire and we see the yellow tongues of flames angrily licking up Eileen's abode, for it was in this vicinity that this dastardly deed was done. An alarm is turned in. Baconrine's finest finally launched their craft and only wrecked half of the building and six firemen. They did not succeed in extinguishing the flames, even though they used nearly all of the town's good water. Behold! Eileen appears from beneath the ruins as if reincarnated and struts majestically forth, between the ranks of firemen and suitors alike. Spurning them all and she departs, leaving behind hearts dripping with woe and unrequitted love.

"A DAUGHTER OF EVE" (Special—Two Parts—August 6).—Eliss Dayton is a good farmer, but a "close" husband and a poor provider. He hopes for a match between his daughter, Janet, and Hiram Brown, a neighbor's son. Janet considers Hiram a bore, and she is delighted when he goes to New York to try to become a millionaire. Even old Dave Pringle, who has been stone-deaf ever since the battle of Gettysburg, is tired of Hiram's noise. Janet meets Milton Wright, who is beginning law practice in Springtown. Through Dayton's minister, Milton secures a welcome at the farm. Mrs. Dayton sees that Janet's one chance for happiness has come, and tries to induce her husband to buy Janet new clothes and a piano. The old man refuses. Using her egg-money for the dress, Mrs. Dayton anticipates an expected legacy and abstracts $200 from her husband's desk. She sends for the piano. Dayton admits that the money spent on the new dress has been well spent, and his enjoyment at church the next Sunday is heightened by Janet's triumph. Milton, too, admires the improvement. Mrs. Dayton gives him an invitation to dinner. But Mrs. Dayton's joy over Janet's happiness is lessened by the return of Hiram who has come home to sell fireless stock among his neighbors. To her dismay, Dayton promises to invest providing that Seth Perkins, the village oracle, does likewise. This postpones the disclosure of her theft, and Mrs. Dayton prays fervently for the legacy to arrive. Dayton prefers Hiram for Janet, and Milton's suit is frowned upon. The storm-clouds gather. Mrs. Dayton receives word that her legacy will not materialize. Her undoing seems inevitable. Janet is let into the secret, and they have a talk with the minister.

Meanwhile Seth Perkins has invested with Hiram, and has made the discovery that he has been buncoed. He has engaged Milton to square accounts. Milton hears Mrs. Dayton's story and gives Janet $200 to put into the desk, sends the pair home, and makes an appointment with Seth and the town constable to meet in Dayton's barnyard. Janet is to wave a handkerchief the moment her father "invests" with Hiram. To his wife's bewilderment, Dayton finds money in the desk. He exchanges the $200 for the worthless stock. Janet waves the handkerchief. Seth sees it first, and by the time Milton and the constable have separated them, the pair have had a watery fight in the horse trough. Seth has had his money's worth. Hiram is decorated with handcuffs and dragged before Dayton, who has just learned from the minister that he has been swindled. As a son-in-law, Hiram has lost charm. The old man ponders gloomily as Milton hands him back his investment. Subdued he hands the $200 to his wife. "You'd better buy 'em a wedding present.' But the present was bought with the original $200, because Mrs. Dayton receives a letter marked: "Returned, wrong address." And even old Dave Pringle, stone-deaf, was on hand to hear the wedding march.

IN FRENCH GUIANA (July 20).—The valley of the Santa River rich in tropical foliage and scenic grandeur is one of the real beauty spots of French Guiana, South America. From the coach windows of the little single track railroad, which winds in curious curves up the valley, one sees the ruins of the old village of Tabouna, full of historic interest but sad in its significance. Further on the falls of the Santa, with its cascades resplendent in rainbow beauty, dash headlong into a thickly wooded valley below and flow peacefully over moss covered rocks.

THE CRAYFISH (July 20).—The crayfish or fresh water lobster is usually found underneath the protecting rocks of shallow river pools. Like the most of his cousins in the great family of crustaceans, he is a night feeder and rarely ventures out from under the great rocks or submerged stumps during the day.

The crayfish is particularly fond of the common garden or angle worm and small chub fish or minnows. His claws, strong and powerfully built for the seizure of his prey, are so firmly attached to his body that one will easily bear his entire weight. The head and thorax of the crayfish are so closely attached as to be practically one part with the rest of his body. For this reason he is unable to move his head, but nature, ever thoughtful and ingenious, has provided him with eyes which can be projected from or drawn within his shell-like covering at will. Though not particularly disturbed when taken from his natural element, water, the crayfish eagerly returns to it when the opportunity affords. Like the lobster he is a substantial article of food and always a tasty addition to the menu.

A BADGER HUNT (July 21).—With a long white snout and small piggish eyes the rapacious little badger, a member of the great bear family, is one of the most destructive animals with which the farmer has to contend. A night prowler, he is omnivorous, and does great damage to the crops as well as among the fowl of the farmyard.

A typical rural pest, the badger slinks away at the first streaks of dawn, and the daylight disclosing the various scenes of his various depredations, finds him safe in his underground home. The mischief committed by the badger during his nocturnal visits provokes the wrath of the farmer, who, with keen scented dogs, trails the animal to its hiding place. There one dog is selected to attack the badger in its tunnel retreat.

With his ear close to the ground the farmer follows the underground battle, and when he thinks the dog has driven the badger to a point sufficiently near the surface, he digs down into the badger's hole. Quite the equal of the dog, the little badger, almost exhausted, moves backward under the new opening. Carefully dropping a long handled pair of steel pincers the farmer catches the badger around the neck and lifts him struggling to the surface. There the frightened animal, blinking but still fighting, is deposited alive and unhurt in a heavy bag. The darkness inside the bag quiets the badger and he is quite safely taken home by the farmer.

LIFE IN JAPAN (July 21).—Kioto, once the capital of Japan, is annually the scene of a peculiar religious ceremony which draws thousands of witnesses from all parts of the empire.

COFFEE CULTIVATION (Santos) (July 27).—What is sweeter incense to the nostrils of the hungry man than the aroma of that most delightful beverage—coffee. And yet how litttle is known to the lay mind concerning the cultivation and handling of this, one of the most important of South America's prolific products.

When the berries are ready for picking (they grow on bushy shrubs averaging 8 to 12 feet), the host of workers throng to the fields and quickly garner the ripened crop. When the beans are sifted and winnowed, these processes removing the leaves, twigs, etc., the coffee is measured, put in sacks and transferred to the mills, where it is washed and sorted. After many handlings, which are essential to the thorough drying and preparing of the beans for market, the coffee is graded and sacked and then brought to the warehouses from whence it is shipped to all parts of the civilized world.

THE HOSTS OF THE SEA (July 27).—To the naturalist, ever on the lookout for strange and interesting creatures, Dame Nature is a seemingly neverendless provider. On the interesting film under this title appear some of the sea's most grotesque and freakish products. Strange little crustaceans such as the callians, squills, dwarf crabs only an inch long, tiny swordfish, etc., are all shown in their native haunts by the aid of really fine photography.

THE STRAITS OF BONIFACIO (Sardinia) (July 28).—Its swirling waters reflecting curious and changing silhouettes against the sky, the Straits of Bonifacia, in Sardinia, afford one of the most interesting boating trips to be found in Southern Italy.

HEMP GROWING (New Zealand) (July 28).—One of the most important industries of New Zealand is the growing of hemp. Reed-like in appearance, it attains a height of from ten to twelve feet, and is harvested by the natives wih a sharp hook-shaped knife. Bundlers follow the cutters and the hemp is stacked on big carts and carried to the factory, where it is washed, cleaned and dried.

The next step consists of feeding the separate reeds into a special machine which splits them into long slender filaments. These filaments, washed by a mechanical conveyor, are then allowed to drain a full day, after which they are carried to the bleaching field and exposed to the sun for about a week.

Thoroughly dried, the hemp filaments are done into bundles which are taken to a separate factory where the center stem of each filament is removed. This process of taking out the woody part of the hemp reed is called "scutching." When it is completed the hemp is a finished product ready for compression into bales and transportation. Conveyed by boat and rail to the great mills it is converted into rope, mats and many other useful articles.

"FIRELIGHT" (Two Parts—August 5).—John Marten is a millionaire twice over, he is money mad and a slave driver. In his chase after the dollar he has completely neglected his faithful wife and closed his heart to love. It is on the tenth anniversary of John Marten's marriage to his wife, an occasion of which Marten has no knowledge, that the men at the plant strike. Furious at this action, Marten declares he will break his men; he plans to import foreign labor.

A message is received by Marten's wife to the effect that the strikers intend killing her husband should he leave the house that day. Neglected and lonesome among her luxurious surroundings, her love for the money master is overpowering; she is frantic with fear. Going up to the garret she brings down an old chest, and, drawing a chair up to fireplace, she extracts one after the other various articles which are reminiscent of the days when she and her husband were young.

Observing this, Marten's heart is touched and memories awaken thick and fast as he gazes in the fireplace. Together they fondle the various objects, see a picture of their first meeting, their boy and girl courtship, and finally their happy wedding dances before their eyes. Then the baby comes and as Marten sits clasping the tiny shoe, the flames reveal the picture of his thoughtless and indifferent ways. Memories of the little one's death and his absence at the time comes before him and then the mad, mad struggle for money and more money. As each remembrance flares up and then dies, the thought of the strikers returns.

Marten starts for the factory. His wife manages to draw him back at her side. Of a sudden the true nature of the man overwhelms him—the veneer shuffles off, and, remembering it is the tenth anniversary of their wedding, he telephones his secretary to meet the demands of the strikers and remains home to make amends, in some slight way, for the lost years.

"MOONLIGHT" (August 9).—Paul La Blanc graduates from the seminary with high honors and his father, an ignorant, but domineering old man, looks fondly forward to his son becoming a priest. Rose Miqueleon, one of the local parishioners, meets Paul. They are mutually attracted. In the privacy of his room, the young fellow paints a picture of the Madonna, with Rose as the subject. The priest of the parish calls in regard to Paul. The latter's sister finds the painting and brings it to the father. The priest recognizes Rose as the inspiration of the painting. Paul's father becomes furious, while his mother slashes the canvass to bits.

Gossip reaches the parents' ears that Paul is paying attention to Rose. One night, taking down his raw-hide whip, the father and mother follow the pair. His anger increasing at every step, the old man is about to burst upon the couple when the pale moonshine peeps softly through the clouds. It awakens memories in the old man's mind and brings back the days when he and his wife were young and in the embrace of romance. The spell wears off, however, and his narrow mind enraged at the course his son is pursuing, he again starts after them. Hiding in the bushes they see Paul tenderly bid Rose good-night and leave, giving her a spray of lilac. The girl, wrapped in her dreams, drops the flower and Paul's father, advancing angrily, picks it up. As he gazes at the love token the moonlight again bathes the landscape and softened by the mighty god of love, husband and wife resign themselves to the inevitable.

VICTOR.

"VALUE RECEIVED" (Two Parts—July 20).—Jack Carruthers is a rough ranchman, but the real gentility of his make-up is shown in his tenderness for his mother. One night they start out for town to see the show. Frances de Vere is leading lady of the show and her husband is manager. A coarse, brute, he forces her on the stage that night though she is ill. The show is so bad that the cowboys determine to break up the performance. Armed with vegetables they bombard the actors. Frances faints and Jack protects her. Seeing she is ill, he and his mother decided to take her home. When the manager objects, Jack, not knowing the man is her husband, knocks him down.

De Vere remains in town and makes ardent love to Dolores Vasques, a little Mexican girl. De Vere promises to marry her but finally tells her he is married. She tells her father, a Mexican with the old traditions, and he promises revenge. Meanwhile Frances has recovered her health. She hesitates to tell them she is married to De Vere. Jack loves her and tries to tell her but she draws away, terrified at the new feeling in her heart for him. Next morning De Vere decides to take his wife away. Frances has gone, leaving a note for Jack telling him that she is married. The boy is stricken with despair and De Vere leaves, laughing cruelly. Outside De Vere meets his fate from the old Mexican. Jack realizes that Frances must be stopped. Madly he rides after the train which has already started. Without a thought of the danger she runs to the platform and gives herself to his arms.

"THE COAST GUARD'S BRIDE" (Two Parts—August 7).—Steven Graves, a petty revenue officer, secures a position as Coast Guard on a lonely island off the coast of Maine. Prior to his departure to the island he marries Irene, a pretty, light-hearted girl, who loves him withal. On the island where the couple take up their future home there is an eccentric, wild hermit who hides away in an improvised cave.

After Steven and Irene are settled on the island and when the days pass by with dull monotony, Irene begins to pine for other society besides that of her husband. Again, she runs across the hermit and thoroughly frightened, she begs her husband to secure a new position in the navy yard and take her back to the village. Steven, believing that he is doing the right thing by his wife—that his kindness should make up for her lonesomeness—is obstinate; he laughs at her fears and refuses.

Time comes when a desperate desire comes over Irene to get away. Determined, she writes a note asking the finder to come and take a pretty girl away from the island, places the letter in a bottle and casts it into the sea. Steven finds the bottle, reads the pleading note, replaces it in the bottle and casts it again into the sea. Then he awaits developments, always watching.

Sim Brady, a friend of Flashy Nellie, a resort keeper, finds the bottle and shows the note to Nellie. They determine to secure Irene and use her as a white slave. In the meantime the hermit has been watching Steven on his daily rounds; he gets a wild desire to gain possession of Steven's telescope.

Sim Brady sets out in a boat for the island and Irene, observing his approach, comes down to the landing and informs him of her troubles. He offers to take her back and she agrees. Steven, the while, sees them leave from where he waits behind a cliff. The hermit comes upon him from behind—there is a desperate fight, during which Irene and Brady get away. Steven finally overcomes the hermit and rushes to the boat landing; he takes his own boat and sets off in pursuit.

Brady takes Irene to the resort and turns her over to Nellie. The latter locks her in and orders her to mingle with the sailors and other frequenters of the resort. Steven finds out from a drunken sailor where Irene is being held. Rushing to the place, he finds the door locked. He breaks in through a window and, following a terrific fight, in which the inmates join, he succeeds in escaping with his wife. He takes her back to the island. On the next day he received a letter which notified him that he has been appointed to a position at the navy yard. Realizing his position in the matter, Stevens informs Irene, foregives her for the escapade, and both rejoice.

JOKER.

"THE THIRD PARTY" (August 5).—Bess is in love with her art, even to the extent that she neglects her husband. To be neglected angers Ernie. A quarrel is the result. At dinner that night Bess receives a telegram telling her that her brother will pay her a visit. Ernie has never seen the brother and Bess knows this, and makes use of the knowledge. She decides to make Ernie jealous. As Ernie is going to work the next morning he bumps into a stranger, whom he watches go into his house. He follows and finds his wife in the arms of another man.

He is angry and goes to his room to think. There he decides to make Bess sorry by making her jealous. He uses his faithful butler to carry out his plans. Dressing him as a girl, they go into the adjoining room of Bess and Phil. A terrible battle of who can love the loudest takes place. Bess and Ernie realize how hopeless it is and both desert their mates. They collide upstairs and tell each other what they think. Phil and the butler get there in time to avert a tragedy. Explanations are made. Bess denounces art and Ernie promises never to be mean again.

"THAT'S FAIR ENOUGH" (August 8).—Schultz's daughter, Mandy, has given her heart to Bob, a fine young fellow, except that he has no money. This is papa's objection and argument in favor of Heinie, who, although rather elderly, possesses wealth. Now, Bob has a giddy spinster sister, Sophia, who, although well fixed with money, has never had an offer of marriage. She writes all about this lamentable fact in her diary "Oh, how gladly I'd give $10,000 for a life mate." This diary falls into the hands of her brother Bob shortly after he is refused Mandy's hand.

Bob tells his love troubles to Sophia, who advises to elope. Bob and Mandy take this advice. They are discovered by Schultz and Heinie, who pursue them. To escape the irate Shultz and Heinie, Mandy and Bob rush to Sophia's house and take refuge in the latter's boudoir, dragging with them the minister. Bob disguises himself in one of Sophia's dresses and her false curls. When the enraged Schultz bursts open the boudoir door he is greeted by what he thinks is an adorable woman. Bob, blushing, lowers his veil.

Later, Schultz proposes marriage to the supposed woman. Bob, with joy, sees his chance to win the $10,000 offered by Sophia for a soul mate. He excuses himself and in another room forces Sophia to don his dress, including veil. Sophia, bewildered, is then showed into the room with Schultz. Hardly believing her ears, Sophia accepts his offer and they are married on the spot. Bob then claims the $10,000, which is gladly given him. Schultz discovers the imposition, but learning that Sophia is wealthy, decides that nothing could be better.

POWERS.

"KATE WATERS OF THE SECRET SERVICE" (Two Parts—July 24).—The Secretary of War receives a decided "jolt" when the daily papers assail the department for lack of zeal in running down the murderer of Colonel Allen, late commandant of the Presidio at Monterey, California. Kate Waters, of the Secret Service, is sent to the scene of the murder with a letter to Colonel Prentice, the successor of Colonel Green. In his household she assumes the role of housemaid in order to learn all she can from the troopers. Lieutenant Bronson flirts with her and she "jollies" him in turn.

The commandant's orderly is given a note written by "Pony" Collins, an officer who wounded Lieutenant Bronson on the night of the murder and later disappeared. Kate and the orderly have become friendly and, appreciating the fact that the orderly is the fountain-head of all post gossip, she "nurses" his regard for her. At her pouting demand, he shows her the note and from it she locates the whereabouts of the missing Collins. Accordingly she visits the underworld section of San Francisco in the guise of a cabaret singer.

One night while she is singing a patriotic song, Collins enters under the influence of liquor. Seeing the flag in her hands, he comes to a military stand. Kate joins him at a table and then notices his West Point class ring. After a few drinks he "loosens up" and tells his story, relating to the dinner party at the colonel's house; how he saw the colonel's wife join Bronson in the gardens and make love to her; how he and the colonel joined them and how he ordered Bronson to leave with him; how he demanded that Bronson cease his attentions to Mrs. Allen; how they came to blows; how he was arrested and ordered to his quarters; how he saw from his window the colonel's wife come from her home and meet Bronson, all dressed to go away; how the colonel came from the house after her and picked up a note she had dropped; how he, Collins, broke his arrest and ran to Mrs. Allen to prevent her going away; how he saw Bronson meet the colonel; how he saw their quarrel and how Bronson shot and killed the colonel; how he met Bronson and shot at him; how he broke from his captors and came to 'Frisco.

Kate persuades Collins to go back with her. She reports to the colonel, resumes her role of maid; meets Bronson, and by accidents gets the keys to his room. The same day she forces a confession from Mrs. Allen and that night "frisks" Bronson's quarters and finds the incriminating note which he had written Mrs. Allen, bidding her meet him and run away. With this evidence she brings Collins to the commandant. Bronson is sent for and placed under arrest. Later Collins is reinstated and he and Kate become sweethearts.

"THE MAN OF HER CHOICE" (August 7).—In "The Man of Her Choice" the girl, the man and the servant are cast away upon an uninhabited island—yes, and the dog. The girl and the man are engaged by the Man, being just an ordinary lower-case man after all, thinks first of himself and his comfort. The servant finds edible berries and the man must have the largest portion because he is the master. The servant catches fish and the man must have the biggest one. In fact, the servant becomes a man and the man a servant—to his own comfort.

The girl watches these things, little things, unnoticed in the whirl of civilized life, but bringing such a message in the waste of sand and sea. The servant, who has become a man, loves the girl and she knows. When they are rescued and she is in peril of returning again to the false standards for which stands the man who is servant, the girl decides she is woman and takes the man of her choice—the servant, who has become man.

CRYSTAL.

"SOME COP" (August 4).—Charlie is a tramp; he is chased by a policeman but escapes into the house occupied by another policeman; he hides in a closet. The policeman disrobes and goes to sleep. Charlie changes clothes with a cop. He goes out into the street, sees a policeman and immediately runs; he goes into another house where a poker game is in session, and proceeds to break it up. He takes all the money in sight.

A burglar enters Vivian's home. She runs to the window and calls Charlie, who is at the other window. Her father returns; the burglar escapes; Charlie goes into the house and pretends that he is having a terrible fight with the burglar. Vivian waits outside. Her father enters and Charlie proceeds to beat him and then tie him up. Vivian, hearing the rumpus, telephones the police station. Charlie changes clothes with his father, who is arrested. Charles escapes. Finally Charlie is seen by the first cop and is captured. He is brought to the jail. Vivian's father is released. Charlie is left to suffer for his sins.

NESTOR.

"FOR OLD TIMES SAKE" (August 5).—The outlaw shoots up the saloon and kills a man. He escapes into the hills. The sheriff and a posse ride out after him. The miner has left his little shack and started for the town when he stumbles at the edge of a cliff, falls and is terribly wounded. Unconscious, he lies in the blistering sun. The outlaw, having eluded the posse, finds the miner's body and some instinct makes him dismount to aid the stranger. Thinking himself free of pursuit, the outlaw carries the miner to the little shack. Here he proceeds to make him as comfortable as possible.

The sheriff comes to the cabin. The outlaw is cornered and gives up, telling the sheriff how he rescued the miner. The latter decides to leave the outlaw with the doctor. Then the outlaw discovers that the unconscious miner is an old college friend. He does everything possible for him and goes out for water. The sheriff comes back with the doctor. Not finding the outlaw, the sheriff thinks he has broken his promise to remain. The outlaw brings in the bucket. As the picture ends the outlaw, not wishing his friend to know the truth, says, "The sheriff and I have to take a prisoner back to jail."

"DETECTIVE DAN CUPID" (August 7).—Love-lorn Bob is infatuated with a young woman whose name he does not know. He has been following her around for a week and he feels that his heart will burst if he does not get an opportunity to declare his passion. One day he follows her to a park and there conceives an idea. If he could only steal her handbag and later return it to her at the hotel, using the incident as an introduction, the rest, he believes, would be smooth sailing. He puts his idea into execution. However a nearby policeman sees him steal the handbag and gives chase. Bob makes good his escape. Upon examining the purse he finds that it contains a costly diamond necklace. The next morning he awakens to find himself a notorious felon with a full description of himself in the paper. However, he learns that her name is Miss Victoria Van Allen. The girl's father employes Detective Potts to recover the jewel and land the thief.

Then Bob begins a wild and sensational career in attempting to return the necklace to Victoria and at the same time elude the sagacious Potts. He disguises and Potts disguises. They discover each other's identity and each assumes a new disguise.

Howbeit the course of true loves leads to victory. Bob is forgiven and his suit accepted by Victoria, while Potts is presented with a fee large enough to lull his conscience in forgetfulness.

FRONTIER.

"A FRONTIER ROMANCE" (August 9).—Dolly, the leading lady, tells Arthur, the leading man, that his suit is hopeless. In her dressing room she recalls the days when she first met Joe, and promised to return, a promise unkept. And later, the baby arrived. She was obliged to leave her home in search of work that the baby might be properly brought up.

In the region where the moving picture studio is located a robbery occurs and the bandit takes to the hills. That same day the moving picture company goes out into the canyon to film some scenes. The leading man, in bandit make-up, goes around a bend in the road, and there awaits the director's signal, as an answer to which he is to fire a shot. The sheriff and his men ride up in search of the real bandit. They see Arthur, who is masked, carrying a roll of bills in his hand. When he fires a shot in answer to the signal, thinking that the bullet is meant for them, the posse returns the fire and Arthur falls, wounded. Impatient at the delay the director hurries to the scene, and, with the aid of his scenario, soon convinces the sheriff that he has shot a moving picture actor. Nearby Joe, the real bandit, has been watching the entire proceedings. In Dolly, the leading lady of the company, he sees the girl he once deceived. Returning that night the sheriff finds tucked under his door the roll of stolen money. Joe finds Dolly in her dressing room and convinces her that he has at last returned to atone for his deceit.

"THE SYMPHONY OF SOULS" (August 6).—A struggling musician lives with his aged mother in their tenement home. Often he plays to himself on his violin, little dreaming that each note is eagerly absorbed by the sightless girl across the hall as she awaits the home-coming of her slaving, worn-out mother from the factory.

Time comes when the sightless girl must bear the added burden of the death of her mother. The musician and his mother come to her succor, and she is given a home. The musician now has a new source of inspiration and his upward climb is rapid. A wonderful symphony emanates from his busy pen, wholly inspired by the blind child's love.

One day the musician sees in the newspaper an item in which the father of the blind girl's mother offers a reward for information concerning either of the two. He has repented of his action in sending away his only daughter for contracting an unapproved marriage and now offers his home to both. The musician's heart is torn by conflicting emotions. Finally duty prompts him to write the wealthy grandfather of the little blind girl, telling him all. The parting causes heart-aches, for the call of the musician's love has been answered by the heart of the blind girl.

The wonderful symphony continues to grow and at last is given to the world, directed by its creator. In a box sits the blind girl and her grandfather. The musician on the verge of success asks the hand of the woman he loves and his dream is realized.

"THE MIDNIGHT VISITOR" (August 9).—Julian is a club man and fond of cards. His wife, about to become a mother, is making baby clothes. Julian tells her he is off for the club for a few hours. She begs him to remain at home as she feels nervous. Julian refuses to listen and goes. Several times during the game, he becomes preoccupied in thought, thoughts of his wife at home. In the meantime his wife calls excitedly for the maid.

Back to the club—the hour is midnight, the players are leaving. Julian, a little tired, and worse for liquor, falls asleep with his head upon the table. Outside his wife's window a ruffian prowls. The wife is in bed. She hears a noise near the window. A coarse, evil face is pressed against the window pane. The wife shrieks and falls back on the bed, apparently lifeless. Julian wakes with the vision of his wife's terrified face before him. He hurries home. He is met by the doctor and maid, who inform him his wife is dead. The shock affects his mind and later he is seen seated in the garden with an attendant. He has a little baby's frock, which he has picked to shreds. A vision of his wife appears, beckoning him. He follows; she leads him through the woods, out to a precipice He steps out.

At the club Julian falls from his chair, he has had a bad nightmare. On arrival home he is met by the doctor and nurses. The doctor whispers in his ear. Julian walks on tip-toe to his wife's bedside. His wife is lying quietly with a new-born baby beside her. Julian falls on his knees and asks forgiveness.

"WHEN THE HEART CALLS" (Two Parts—August 6).—A wealthy father disinherits his son on learning his intention to marry a chorus girl. The son defies his father and marries the girl. Together they go to live on a farm.

Time passes and poverty follows the young people, though their love for each other grows stronger. And all the while the old man, alone in his mansion, misses his son. Pride, however, prevents him calling the boy back, and the days pass in loneliness. His great wealth brings him no happiness. While plowing in the fields one day the son, weakened by hardship and anxiety for his wife and children, is suddenly stricken with paralysis. The family is plunged in gloom. The small savings disappear; the wife tries to hide the worst of it from the children and the husband. One day the old father leaves the mansion for a few weeks' visit to a small country village—he hopes to get away from the old familiar scenes and forget the sorrows that press upon him.

Meantime the two children beg their mother for permission to wander in the fields. Shortly after we find them by the lake shore picking flowers. Nearby the old grandfather is strolling. The children are wading in the water—they get out beyond their depth and death threatens them. The grandfather hears their cries for help—he rushes to their rescue. Once safe on land, he takes them to their mother. The children have insisted on this. The mother greets the children frantically and thanks the old man. Strangely fascinated by him, the babes climb upon his knee and he

TREY O' HEARTS (First Installment—Three Parts -August 11).—The first reel of this installment is taken up by the prologue. Seneca Trine, middle aged and powerful in the financial world, had married a girl much younger than himself. The girl was forced into the marriage through circumstances rather than through love she felt toward Trine. In fact she loved another, Wellington Law. At the opening of the prologue we find Trine's wife the mother of twin girls, unhappy in thoughts which still haunt her of her old sweetheart Law. Law, on the other hand, is married to a cool, calculating woman, is the father of a boy.

In the course of time Trine begins to suspect the affection that his wife still feels for Law and with a bitter heart, he undertakes a scheme to ruin his wife's sweetheart. At a ball one evening, he secures positive proof of his wife's attitude toward him, and his determination to ruin Law crystallizes into definite action. A month later Trine's plans of revenge against the man whom he believes has robbed him of his wife's love, are carried to completion—Law is ruined

Desperate and desiring fresh air, Law drives into the country in his automobile. As fate would have it, he accidently runs down Trine. Discovering the identity of the wounded man, he flees. Trine recovers but is left a paralytic for life. It is following this that Trine plans to kill Law and he writes him to this effect. Law is already broken down, mentally and physically, and when he begins to find here and there a trey o' heart card—Trine's sign of approaching revenge—he takes the easiest way out by killing himself, after sending his boy to Europe

At the opening of the play proper Law, Jr., is a prosperous young business man in London. Trine, still in America, has not forgotten his plan of revenge; he awaits the time when Law, Jr., is the happiest to strike him down. Rose, one of twin daughters, he sends to Europe for the purpose of meeting and securing Law's love. Rose, however, is unaware of her father's intentions; she has high ideals and a tender heart while her sister, Judith, is hard and revengeful, the prototype of her father.

Law, Jr., meets Rose at a watering place and it is a case of love at first sight with both. It is at this point that Rose receives the first strange letter from her father, hinting at her love and assuring her that she will never marry Law—that he will die before that. Law, for the first time, finds a trey o' hearts and, acquainted with the fued, suspects its meaning. Rose, fearful for Law's life, departs, telling her sweetheart that she will send him a rose—a token of love—if she ever needs him.

Through his agents Trine is informed of the complete affair. Through him a rose is sent from America to Law—he hopes to get Law into America where he can the better kill him. Law receives the rose and leaves London, intending to go by way of Canada to his sweetheart. Informed of this, Trine sends his daughter Judith into Canada to meet Law and bring him back, dead or alive.

Once in Canada, Judith surrounds herself with bribed half-breeds and prepares to carry out her father's wishes. She follows Law into the mountains and captures him. Law believes he stands before Rose, but is informed otherwise; he is left to die, tied hand and foot in a forest fire. Law manages to break his bonds and escapes to the river bank. Far out in the stream he observes Judith departing with her guide in a canoe. He shoots and kills the guide. Judith, in the canoe without an oar, floats toward the rapids and falls below. Law, realizing her plight, rushes to a log spanning the rapids, leans far down and drags the girl out of the onrushing canoe.

What with his wounds, Law is exhausted after this. Judith helps him to a clearing in the woods and holds his head while he falls into a deep sleep; and to Judith comes the first awakening of love. But she leaves the man sleeping; and the man, when he awakens, finds on his breast a rose where he expected to find a trey o' hearts.

"LUCILLE LOVE, THE GIRL OF MYSTERY" (No. 14—July 14).—After her humiliation in the eyes of the man she loves, and after failing to secure the information she sought to secure by eavesdropping on Loubeque in the cafe, Lucille returns to her hotel crestfallen and without hope. However, good fortune comes from an unexpected source, and by a strange stroke of circumstances Hugo Loubeque is again outwitted in an attempt to deliver the documents to Lieutenant Hadley. By previous arrangement, Hadley was to communicate with Loubeque by carrier pigeon and arrange for a definite meeting place. As Lucille sat at breakfast before an open window the pigeon, bound for Loubeque's room, was attracted into Lucille's window by the crumbs upon the table. She took up the bird and began fondling it, when she discovered Hadley's note, and then wrote another, a misleading missive, and substituted it for the original. The pigeon then was liberated and flew to Loubeque's room with the counterfeit message.

In the meantime, Thompson, the crook-butler, steals into Loubeque's room in an attempt to avenge himself upon the international spy. While Thompson is still hiding in his room, Lucille enters with the intention of drawing Loubeque out and making him speak. She is unsuccessful, however, and leaves, but not before she realizes that something is wrong. Something is wrong. Loubeque has heard some one behind his curtain, and then begins to steal forward toward the spy. Lucille is watching from the fire escape. She watches Loubeque wait for an opportune moment, and then swing around on the butler and disarm him before he can put his murderous plan into execution. Loubeque then telephones the police that there is a thief in his room.

Loubeque hesitates in having Thompson arrested, however, when the butler tells him that he will tell the police all. Thompson awaits his chance, and attempts to kill Loubeque, who is too quick for him, and shoots him. He drags Thompson's body out of his room and into Lucille's room.

In the meantime the girl has entered Loubeque's room and begins searching for his papers. The police enter and arrest her as a thief. Despite her objections she is taken to the police station. While this is happening, however, Loubeque discovers that Lucille has been arrested in error. Then he does a strange thing. As long as she is in jail she cannot interfere with his plans. It would have been the most natural thing in the world for him to have left her there. Instead of doing this, he at once communicated with the police and instructed them to release Lucille, as she was not the thief, and was arrested in error. Lucille is set free. She is coming to understand Loubeque less every day. She realizes, and had had demonstration of his iron will. She had done everything in her power to defeat him, and even to attempt to kill him, and then he is instrumental in having her released from prison. He is an enigma, a paradox.

He steals a horse and buggy and starts for the train. The horse refuses to hurry. Ike builds a fire under him. The horse goes far enough to set the buggy on fire, leaving Ike in a worse predicament than ever. He thinks quickly, unhooks the horse and mounts him, but the horse bucks and throws Ike off. Ike reaches the station tired and dirty just in time to catch the train. Meantime Louise has tried on her dress and decides that she must have a train. Her wishes are granted by mother. Mother has left father to watch the wedding cake, but he goes to sleep and lets it burn.

The rest of the uproarious comedy deals with the many unhappy adventures that Ike and his sweetheart pass through before the wedding ceremony is finally performed.

A MIDSUMMER'S LOVE TANGLE (July 28).—Judge Lynn sends his family, consisting of his wife, Trixy, his daughter, and "Buddy," the young son, to his country home at Lakeside. Judge Lynn makes it a practice to visit his family for the week end. Jack Weston, a young gentleman of leisure, visits Lakeside and meets Trixy. Jack takes Trixy out sailing and arouses the ill-will of "Buddy" when he refuses to allow that young gentleman to accompany them. "Buddy" promises to get even. That same evening the Judge unexpectedly returns. The following morning, the Judge is reading in the library, Mrs. Lynn and "Buddy" present. The Judge comes across an article in the paper that interests him. It is to the effect that Slippery Sam, the notorious diamond thief, is supposed to be in the neighborhood of Lakeside disguised as a woman. Trixy is passing through the room at the time dressed for yachting and carrying several papers, magazines and a substantial lunch. The Judge stops her and reads the article to the women folks and warns them to be careful of their jewelry. "Buddy" is particularly interested and goes to his father and is shown a photograph of the diamond thief. Trixy asks Buddy to carry the lunch. He agrees to do so feeling that his reward will be a sail on the lake. He is much disappointed to find his sister and her sweetheart believe in the old adage "two is company, three is a crowd." He is very angry and gets into an old boat and sits down to devise ways and means to effect a revenge. He decides to go in for a swim. In the meantime the Judge is uncomfortably warm. In his walk through his grounds, the Judge sees his son in swimming. He goes and draws him into the boat and gives him a licking for going swimming on Sunday. "Buddy" goes ashore and walks toward the house. The Judge sits in the boat. It is very warm; the water is cool. There is a temptation. He yields and is soon swimming about. From a distance "Buddy" sees this and when his father swims out into the lake he decides to even up matters. He returns and steals the Judge's clothes. The Judge returns from his swim and misses his clothes, wraps some gunnysack around himself and wades ashore. He comes to a tent and stops to investigate. He enters, expecting to find some man's clothing. He finds nothing but ladies' wearing apparel. Knowing it is the only decent way he can get home he dons one of the dresses which belongs to an old maid who owns the tent.

Meanwhile, "Buddy," seeing his father dressed up in woman's clothes, hurries home and gets the paper relative to Slippery Sam. This he takes with him and goes to meet Jack Weston and his sister. He shows the paper to Jack and tells that worthy he knows where Slippery Sam is. Jack, wishing to prove his prowess, accompanies "Buddy." They see the Judge flitting from tree to tree as though to hide. "Buddy" points him out as Slippery Sam. Jack has never seen the Judge, and knowing how the capture of a notorious thief will help him with his suit, summons up all his courage and arrests the Judge and forces him to accompany him to the lock-up. The Judge protests but all to no avail. In a short time the Judge is liberated. That night Jack, not knowing the trouble he has stirred up for himself, calls on the Judge and asks for the hand of Trixy. There is a mutual recognition and Jack beats an ignominious retreat notwithstanding the entreaties of Trixy. But Jack still hopes to win the fair hand of Trixy.

AT THE END OF A PERFECT DAY (Two Parts—August 3).—Dorothy refuses Oren for her mather's sake and, aided by Stid, Oren's rival, Oren goes west, while Dorothy's mother grieves over the uncalled-for sacrifice of Dorothy, showing Dorothy the handsome white silk wedding dress she was saving for her as Oren's bride. Months later Oren writes. Stid, on account of Mother Preston's mislaid glasses, reads the letter for her and steals a self-addressed envelope which hopelessly separates Dorothy and Oren. Oren marries, while Stid presses a hopeless claim on Dorothy, finally getting his father, chairman of school-board, to discharge her. Dorothy relents, takes Stid's ring, but at the side of her dying mother, removes the ring and Stid enters to see mother's silent hands holding the ring which settled his fate, awakening his manhood and causing him to hand Dorothy an intercepted letter. Dorothy opens the letter; a tiny card announces the birth of "Dorothy Preston Evans," Oren's baby. With the card pressed to her lips, Dorothy rises above her double grief in complete resignation.

Fifteen years later Dorothy has surrendered to circumstances and unconsciously enhanced her years by extreme plainness and humble servitude to her boarders, whose gayety seems far separated from her years. Widowed Oren, with his fifteen-year-old daughter, arrive; they board at Dorothy's. Oren is visibly disappointed in appearance of Dorothy and seems to be entranced by attractive Miss Everlyn, a boarder. Oren's daughter grasps the situation and, deeply in love with Dorothy after whom she is named, she sees that Dorothy's inner beauty is not equalled by her outer appearance. Dorothy, in her window, witnesses the frolic of her paired-off boarders and in tears, prays that her long-shadowed life may have one perfect day.

The Perfect Day dawns with resolutions to make her boarders happy by the seaside. Dorothy refuses to go, but before the picnic lunch is served Oren's daughter, displeased with her father's attentions to Miss Everlyn, goes for Dorothy, who refuses to go on account of no clothes. Oren's daughter pulls her into the bedroom, produces one of her own charming dresses. The girl sees the old leather trunk, is curious, and Dorothy shows the girl her mother's white silk dress. Altho over 50 years old, the girl declares it is exactly the style of today and commands Dorothy, dressing her hair and making her wear the wedding dress. Later the picnic party is thrown into a flutter by Oren's daughter bringing Dorothy, dainty, handsome and modest, as a guest. Oren comes to his senses and serves Dorothy while Dorothy overhears insinuations from Miss Everlyn and later by the beach declares to Oren she hates him and herself for her indecent actions. Dorothy hurries away, but from the heights sees Oren pushing out on the water alone. Dorothy, about to tear off her dress and bob up her hair is startled by flashes of lightning; a storm is coming. She rushes to the kitchen; the girls come in; no one knows where Oren is and Dorothy is sure he will drown on the rough sea; she hastens away for help. By the seaside before the terrible sea, she sees the overturned boat, and cries out a prayer while Oren, who was home, finds Dorothy by the sea where her tears are convincing and her love seen by Oren and as the day ends Dorothy wins her wish, closing her "Perfect Day."

THE WIDOW (August 5).—A young widow finds it impossible to recover from her grief and in desperation determines to move to a small place where she will know no one and can get away from the painful associations which constantly reopen the wound of her grief. Her faithful maid accompanies her and they carry out their plan. The widow refuses to receive anyone and to the alarm of the maid gives herself over to melancholy. The mystery attaching to the life of the widow arouses the gossips. The maid in desperation asks the minister to come in and see her mistress one day as he is passing. He rouses the despondent woman by pointing out to her the beauty of the service. She plans a children's hospital and becomes the good angel of the village, forgetting herself in the misery of others. The gossips seeing many men visit her home, such as the architect, lawyer and even the minister, rouse themselves to anger and decide to make her quit the neighborhood. They are confounded by the minister who discloses her identity as the "Good Angel."

MAJESTIC.

THE ANGEL OF CONTENTION (Two Parts—July 5).—Nettie is beloved by all the boys in the mining camp. Magoon, a big, jovial miner, loves her most of all, however, and asks her to become his wife. Nettie is in love with Colter, a young Easterner, and though it pains her to do so, tells Magoon of the fact. Magoon leaves town to become sheriff of the adjoining county.

A murder is committed in the mining camp, and Colter is unjustly accused. Nettie rescues him from jail and sends him to Magoon. The sheriff with admirable self-sacrifice hides his rival, and, when the posse arrives, points out what Nettie has done for the boys of the mining camp. Colter is released, and all the boys escort him back to Nettie.

THE BEAUTIFUL CITY (Two Parts—July 12).—The country boy, despite the advice of a fellow-townsman, goes to the city, where, after an encounter with a motion picture holdup man, is engaged as property boy in a studio.

His fellow-townsman comes to the city when he learns that his wife, from whom he has become estranged, is dying. After his wife's death the countryman falls in with his wife's worthless brother and attempts to rob the house where the country boy is living.

The landlord's daughter, who has been a kind friend to the country boy, calls for help when she sees the two men trying to make off with money which her father has entrusted to her. The country boy saves the girl from the tramps, and secures the release of his fellow-townsman, who promises to lead a better life in future.

THE PAINTED LADY (Two Parts—July 19).—Jess, a country girl, leaves home when her sister tries to boss her. Later she secures employment in a department store in the city. There she meets Jake, a good-for-nothing, who promises to marry her. Jane, Jess's elder sister, follows her to the city and secures employment in the same store. Jane soon learns that Jake does not intend to marry her sister, and, pretending to be infatuated with him herself, decides to give her sister proof of her supposed sweetheart's true character.

Jess hides in Jake's rooms and Jane enters with the ne'er-do-well. Jake attempts to force Jane to his will with a revolver. Jane promises to be his sweetheart, provided he signs a note, presumably to Jess, saying: "I am tired of this life," etc. Jake signs the note, and when Jane fails to keep her promise there is a struggle for possession of the weapon. In the confusion the revolver is accidentally discharged and Jake is killed. The girls pin the note to his chest, and the police, believing it to be a case of suicide, make no investigation.

A RED MAN'S HEART (July 21).—Long Pete, champion rough and tumble fighter of the mining camp, has soundly thrashed every man in the settlement except Aaron Dill, a giant Indian. Pete is in love with Madge, the daughter of a newcomer to the camp, who refuses to have anything to do with him while he continues to carouse and fight. Pete gives up his old habits for her and his companions think he has turned coward.

They torment him beyond endurance, and Pete once more forgets himself and beats up the whole camp, winding up by attacking Dill. Peter and Dill agree to go to the mountains and have it out to the death. Dill sets a bear trap in Pete's trail, and Pete stumbles and breaks his arm in the jaws of the steel trap. Despite his agony, he determines to meet Dill at the appointed place.

Passing Dill's cabin, he finds Oneida Jim, an outcast Indian, attacking Dill's squaw. Pete soundly whips the Indian and ties him in a corner. Dill's wife begs Pete to stay, fearing that Oneida Jim will break loose again. Meanwhile Dill returns, and the two are about to fight it out in the cabin when Dill's wife explains matters and the men patch up their quarrel.

KOMIC.

HOW BILL SQUARED IT FOR HIS BOSS (July 19).—Mr. Hadley, Bill's employer, shows Bill a picture of Alice Mordaunt, his fiancee, and tells his office boy to admit her at once when she arrives. Bill goes out to lunch and returns to find his employer kissing Ethel, Hadley's sister. Bill is properly horrified at such duplicity, but, faithful at all times to his employer, attempts to slip in a notet warning his boss to get the "other dame" out of the way when Alice arrives.

Alice, however, intercepts the note, sees Hadley kissing a strange woman and leaves in a rage. Hadley hurriedly explains things to Bill and sends him after Alice, who, when everything is explained ,is mollified and greets Ethel affectionately.

PRINCESS.

THE VETERAN'S SWORD (July 17).—Col. Saunders, a veteran of the Civil War, cherishes a sword presented to him for gallantry at the Battle of Gettysburg. John Boyd, a young married man and a friend of the veteran, is accused of theft and placed in prison. Col. Saunders and Mrs. Boyd appeal in vain to Boyd's employer to obtain the young man's release. The employer consents on condition that Col. Saunders give him his Gettysburg sword which he has long coveted. The veteran makes the sacrifice but incurs the displeasure of his old commandery comrades who believe, because of his silence, that he has disposed of the weapon for money. Boyd's innocence is proved and his young wife explains his act to the veterans. Soon after Col. Saunders regains his sword and his comrades celebrate the event in the old colonel's home.

RELIANCE.

IZZY AND THE DIAMOND (July 22).—Izzy's boss, a jeweler, carries uncut diamonds around in his pockets. At lunch one noon he jerks a handkerchief from his pocket and the diamond falls into a bowl of cracked ice. When the stone is missed Izzy is told to find it or lose his job. Izzy, after searching high and low, despairs of ever recovering it. He drops into the lunch room for a soft drink, and absent-mindedly cools his fevered brain by sucking ice from a bowl on the counter. One of the pieces of ice nearly cracks a tooth, and Izzy discovers it to be the lost diamond. Izzy comes in for the congratulations of the whole office, which had been under suspicion.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL NO. 28 (July 27).—Following Madame Dolores' advice Margaret, Mrs. Knickerbocker, Dunbar and the entire party sought in the beautiful cities between the North and the South Atlantic coast for "One with a red rose, in a cottage by the sea." At Long Branch Margaret was introduced to John Stuyvesant, the son of Mrs. Knickerbocker's old friend, Natalie Stuyvesant, who before her marriage was a Barasdale. Dunbar, not any too cordial to his rival in the first place, became enraged when Margaret went off for an automobile spin with the tall young society man. That evening Stuyvesant made considerable progress with Margaret in his quiet way. Dunbar sought trouble with the young New Yorker, and might have strangled him if Aunty had not come upon the scene.

Fearing more trouble between the two aspirants for Margaret's affections, Aunty next day requested the party to pack up. Then Margaret saw, standing on the porch of a cottage near the hotel, a woman of middle years walking up and down. In her corsage was the long-sought red rose.

"Tell me," inquired Margaret of the woman, "do you know Madame Dolores?"

The woman smiled.

"Yes, my child. She has told me of you, and I am to give you a message. A man who would marry you is threatened by great trouble and sorrow. I see a scandal hovering over him like a cloud. Beware, for if you marry him you share his humiliation."

VENGEANCE OF GOLD (July 19).—Mary Lee breaks her engagement with Jim, her penniless suitor, to marry Carroll, a wealthy miner. Later Carroll loses his fortune and abuses Mary. While prospecting, he meets Jim, who is returning across the desert to civilization with a burro laden with gold. Carroll shoots Jim and leaves him for dead.

Carroll returns home and packs up, telling Mary that he is going to leave her now that he has gold enough to have a good time in town. Mary shoots after him as he leaves and punctures his water can. Carroll, when far in the desert, discovers that his water is gone. Later his burro, frightened by a rattlesnake, bolts and returns across the desert to Carroll's cabin. Carroll succumbs to thirst in the desert.

Meanwhile Jim, badly wounded, drags himself to Carroll's cabin, where Mary nurses him back to health.

"JIM REGAN'S LAST RAID" (Two Parts—August 5).—Jim Regan is a worthless drunkard. His wife, Anna, a good woman, refuses to live with him. She staggers out and into the forest where she is picked up by a wagon train. She informs her rescuers that she is the last survivor of an Indian massacre. By the rescuing party she is taken to Silver City. In order to become self supporting she obtains a position in a dance hall and saloon run by a man named Channing. Channing is a very clever man, and Anna's personality attracts him. She works in his dance hall and his devotion to her is shown when Bill Williams, a drunken prospector, attempts to embrace her. He kicks Williams from the place. Anna and Channing finally fall in love, but to all of Channing's proposals of marriage Anna gives him a refusal, although informing him that she loves him.

At this time Jim Regan is notified by a band of his associates that they are about to pull off a holdup of the saloon and dance hall. Jim Regan joins them. Meanwhile Anna, on the night of the proposed robbery, has left the dance hall and is going homeward. Upon her way she overheard the proposed plans of the robbers. She is captured by them and tied up in a deserted hut. They repair to the saloon and overpower Channing who has retired. They are engaged in cracking the safe when Anna frees herself from her bonds, returns and shoots Jim Regan through the window. He attempts to reveal her secret but death seals his lips. Channing and Anna are united after the death of Jim Regan.

fans the fuel of her discontent and after many secret meetings urges her to leave her husband. After a quarrel, Cory leaves home, telling Marion he will spend the night at a hotel and later she can start proceedings for divorce. Her former sweetheart, Graham, watching the house, sees Cory leave, and comes to Marion. While they are downstairs, a burglar breaks in. He starts to take silver from Marion's bureau, but stops as he sees John Cory's picture, whom he recognizes as the attorney who at one time saved him from prison. On his way down stairs to make his escape, the burglar overhears Graham persuading Marion to leave. Andrews realizes that this is the time to return his debt to Cory. He binds Graham to his chair and makes Marion go up stairs where he tells her who he is and what a friend her husband has been to him, and finally persuades Marion of the folly of eloping with Graham.

In the meantime Graham has succeeded in getting to the phone and reaching the officers. When the officers arrive, Marion hides the burglar in the closet and also her silver; then tells the officers that the burglar got out of the window with all her silver. They go in search of him. Marion then tells Graham to leave. After parting with the burglar and making him a present of her husband's picture, she calls up John. He hurries home and they are reconciled.

"CURSE OF CASTE" (Two Parts—July 30).—Kata, a high class Japanese, is desirous of marrying Kissmoia, a low caste Japanese girl of the Etss. The father of Kato, a stern old aristocrat, refuses his consent to the marriage. The girl Kissmoia, realizing that she may cause her lover the displeasure of his father, takes her pack and leaves. Kato, who has seen her leaving, rushes after her and begs her to remain until he interviews his father and tells him of his love for her, and that marriage is his fondest hope. She remains while Kato interviews his father. The old man sternly refuses to consider the alliance, and Kato leaves his father's house and marries the girl of his choice.

A short time later he is living in a Japanese fishing village and while devotedly loving his wife, he also has many sorrowful moments when thinking of his aged father whom he also loves tenderly, Kissomoia sees this sorrow of her husband. Kato receives a communication from his father telling him that the old man's days are numbered and requesting that he return and live with him during the declining days of his life. The letter also specifies that under no circumstances will the proud old father receive his wife into the house. Kato unwittingly drops the letter which is discovered by Kissmoia. She resolves to forever remove herself from the pathway of her husband whom she believes she is dragging down. She leaves, goes to the ocean and there commits suicide by leaping into it. After a bitter all night with himself, the love of Kato for his wife overcomes that for his father and he rushes into her room only to find that she has gone. He sees the note which she left and becomes frantic. A searching party is organized and Kato discovers the body of Kisomoia floating in the surf at nightfall. While the surf washes around him, and with the body of his dead wife clasped in his arms, he stares vacantly out to sea, and the picture dissolves with them in that position.

"THE LITTLE GRAY LADY" (Four Parts).—Anna Gray is a quiet, high principled young woman who falls in love with Perry Carlyle, a weak, young clerk whose own extravagant tastes, and the dissipations induced by endeavoring to please Ruth Jordon have combined to plunge him into both debt and dissatisfaction at his lot.

He finds that his position in the Treasury department enables him to obtain possession of pieces of mutilated money and that by pasting them together he can induce tradesmen to accept them for good bills and so add considerably to his income. In a very few days, however, the Secret Service men are on his trail and it is only owing to the heroic self-sacrifice of Anna that he is saved from the consequences of his crime. Ruth in his trouble discards him, and as he realizes that her affection was inspired only by mercenary motives, while Anna loves him sincerely for himself alone, he is swept in a revulsion of feeling to a love for her which is as deep and lasting as her own.

There are moments of the most tense and thrilling suspense while Anna is concealing Perry from the police and when she confronts Ruth and struggles with her for the evidence which will clear or convict Perry, the situation is tremendous as the two women struggle with all the fierceness of love, passion and despair.

"THE SCALES OF JUSTICE" (Five Parts).—Robert Darrow, District Attorney of Russellville, meets and loves Edith Dexter, a young widow, grand-daughter of Phillip Russell, the community's leading citizen. Russell wants Edith to marry the son of his life-long friend, Walter Elliott, to whom he has given the management of his business. Elliot, unknown to his benefactor, has juggled with the firm's money, and the old man, discovering a shortage, telephones Walcott, his legal adviser, to go over the books and see what is wrong. Elliot learns this, fears Walcott will discover the truth, and hopes to make certain changes in the ledgers before it is too late. That night Edith gives a lawn-party, and Darrow is the favored guest. Old Russell observes that she is slighting Elliot, and a violent quarrel follows. In a frenzy, Edith at last seizes a paper-knife, threatening to take her life if her grandfather does not cease his persecution. Miss Tripp, an old maid, and Elliot, witness the quarrel, and the former believes Edith to be threatening her grandfather. That night Phillip Russell, while going over the books alone, is struck down and his murderer flees. On account of the recent quarrel, and because she inherits the bulk of the old man's fortune, Edith is suspected. Darrow protects Edith, and against his own sense of duty, conceals the knife he finds on her person. Bill Crump, a horse thief, is discovered lurking about the premises, and is finally charged with the crime, but as no proof can be found against him, the affair is temporarily suspended. But Elliot, being finally rejected by Edith, engages a detective to whom he gives clues which seemingly convict Edith, and in spite of Darrow's great love, he is forced to sign the warrant for her arrest. While in prison, Crump, awaiting his sentence for horse stealing, is befriended and comforted by little Alice, Edith's child. The night before the trial, Darrow, torn between the conflicting forces of love and duty, goes to Edith and tells her that alive the evidence against her could not be wrested from him, but dead it can be easily taken from his hand. From his frenzied manner Edith divines that he contemplates suicide to liberate her, and she urges him to do his duty and prosecute her, telling him that the truth will in some way come to their rescue. Darrow lacks her faith, and goes home to spend a sleepless night. Crump overhears Edith's plea with Darrow, and this determines him to a great decision, for he, too, has been struggling between two strong emotions, love and fear. The trial takes place, and Darrow is forced to cross-examine the woman he loves, as she stands on trial for her life. If he remain true to his oath to the State, he must produce the concealed and condemning evidence; if he remain faithful to the woman, he must sacrifice honor and duty. In a paroxysm of grief he breaks down during the cross-examination, and resigns his office rather than publicly prosecute his fiancee. But the love of little Alice has conquered the hardened Crump, who comes forward and confesses that he had seen the real murderer strike the fatal blow, and that fear had kept him silent until that moment, when sympathy proved stronger than terror. Crump goes to serve his sentence, a happier man than ever before, and Darrow takes up his life anew, having learned that love is the greatest law and outweighs all else in the scales of Almighty Justice.

"THE GREAT STROKE" (Five Parts).—Colonel Hudson, tired of paying the debts of his nephew, Lieutenant Egan, refuses once and for all the Lieutenant's demands. Having pledged his honor as an officer for payment of his debts, Egan, in despair, forces the Hudson safe and takes $2,500. Boldly admitting the theft, Egan is denounced by his uncle and sent to jail. In departing he makes a threat that inasmuch as he has been branded a thief he will remain one.

After two years' imprisonment, he is freed and at once returns to the home of his uncle, and again robs the safe. He is discovered by Mary Hudson, his cousin and sweetheart, who induces him to return his booty and take a new start. Personally furnishing the funds for this, she bids him, for her sake, to become a better man. Instead he falls in with a gang of crooks, of which he becomes leader, under the name of "Dr. Morris." Having received word that the firm of Herzog & Company are to spend a special messenger with a valuable shipment of pearls on a certain train, "Dr. Morris" personally conducts the party.

Stepping from his compartment, crawls under the car and bores a hole through the floor, into the one occupied by the messenger, and forces deadly fume, by the aid of a specially design apparatus, upon the unsuspecting messenger. The messenger, becoming stupified, does not regain consciousness until the "Doctor" has taken the pearls and is well on his way home. Detectives are employed and a reward offered for the return of the goods. Being famous pearls, the gang has difficulty in disposing of them, so decide to accept the reward. During the transactions, the hiding place of the gang is discovered and they are tracked, but outwit the police. During the escape, in an automobile, "Dr. Morris" jumps on the running-board of a car, going in the opposite direction, and leaves his comrades for the authorities. Going back to the home of his sweetheart, he seeks forgiveness, and they immediately sail to foreign lands to find happiness and respectability.

PASQUALI-AMERICAN.

THE SILENT BELL.—This drama tells a most thrilling story of the daring attempt of the noblest and best of Italian blood, aided by France to throw off the Austrian yoke in the year 1865, and their escape from death through the courage and heroism of a child. The scene opens with the secret meeting of the chiefs of the revolution in an old house. They are receiving the last news from the sub-committees of the other districts before the signal to attack the Austrian government. Rinaldo Ramardo, the private secretary of Prince Paul, the leader of the revolutionary movement is introduced as a new member, he is desperately in love with the Princess Paul, and when his love is repulsed he plots revenge. Prince Paul trustingly shows the new member Rinaldo, the secret exit from the house to be used in case of emergency.

Rinaldo, driven by his insane passion, informs the commander of the citadel of the plot against the government. When the conspirators are surprised in their next meeting they make their escape with the loss of only one member, but he unfortunately carries the list of the leaders. They are all quickly run to earth, Prince Paul among the number. He had trusted for his escape to the secret exit from his house, but the traitor, Rinaldo, has stolen the key. He bids a touching farewell to his devoted wife and little boy Victor.

Overcome with grief at the lengths to which his passion for the Princess had driven him, the traitor kills himself and begs forgiveness with his dying breath. The Prince is quickly condemned to death and a proclamation posted in the city announcing the execution of the political prisoners at dawn the following morning when the bell from the Red Tower rings the signal, but on the morning of the execution, little Prince Victor, his son, passes the sentinels, climbs the old belfry tower and swings from the clapper of the citadel's bell, preventing the death signal. He is brought before the Austrian Commandant and pleads together with his mother for his father's life, but without avail. In the nick of time a dispatch is brought in declaring peace between the French and Austrian armies, and little Victor has saved his father's life.

"LUPIN" (Three Parts).—Mrs. Josette Percy is left a large legacy by her rich uncle, James Gordon, and the only clew he left as to where it may be found is contained in the following abstract of his will: "I bequeath to my niece, Josette Percy, my entire estate, which is safely hidden in a place indicated by the directions written in my hand in ink that only becomes legible when subjected to heat. The writing will be found on the back of my prehistoric Egyptian parchment X. L. B. in my strongbox on the library table in my house in Paris." This parchment she finds has been stolen. She is in despair until, while reading the morning paper, she sees an account of the liberation of the famous Lupin from prison.

It takes a thief to catch a thief so she appeals to him to recover her fortune. The accommodating Lupin soon decides the famous Egyptian collector, Sir Rhulend, would know if it had been offered for sale, and sure enough Sir Rhulend has bought it. In the night-time he cleverly picks the safe and secures the document; but disturbed by a noise leaves the safe door open.

A trusted servant steals the priceless antique jewelry also kept there, and Lupin is forced to set about tracing this to. He identifies the servant's thumb prints on the safe door with those on the bottom of a smoked plate and shadows the thief to his confederates' den. The thieves capture him, but he cleverly makes his escape, not forgetting to take the jewelry. He replaces the real stones with imitation ones and returns them to Sir Rhulend, wins Mrs. Percy's love and flees with her, leaving poor Sir Rhulend a gently sarcastic note to console him for his loss.

"CHASING A MILLION" or "ROUND THE WORLD IN EIGHTY DAYS" (Three Parts).—Noon, at the Place Pignalle..... Noon is not the hour for crime or wrong doing. There are too many people on Montmartre Heights. The wealthy Rajah of Yeahbo is courting Piggy, a nice little flower seller at l'Abbaye. This displeases Nutty and is equally displeasing to Cremo, both of whom are warm admirers of the fair one. Time goes on. A race is announced. A million dollars in coin is to be the reward of the first one who finds the hidden copy of "The Lyre." A million Cremo and Nutty feel sure they will win it. A train passes. Cremo jumps on to the engine and hangs to the buffer and thus arrives at Marseilles.

The same day in the arena of Marseilles, one hundred dollars is offered to the pluckiest bullfighter. Nutty fights the bull with the perilous horns and wins. Then he takes a first cabin aboard a boat just on the point of sailing. Piggy catches the steamer and Cremo swims after his friends and overtakes them at Port Said. Cremo pours out his affections to Piggy in words warmer than the sun. Nutty beside himself, challenges his rival to mortal combat. Armed with their pillows, the duellists assail each other with furious blows. Suddenly a storm bursts out. The waves run mountain high; the ship cannot withstand the shock and splits asunder. Amid the flashing lightning the three travellers plunge into the sea and come ashore on the coast of Egypt. Overcome by emotion and fatigue, Nutty falls asleep on the sand. A magnificent alligator, taking pity on him, swallows him at a single gulp. Frightened, Piggy and Vremo, who were asleep hard by and who were awakened by the gritting of the teeth of the voracious beast, escape into a neighboring forest, only to fall into the claws of a lion. The lion, however, knows a thing or two. He has studied the classics and lets Piggy alone.

Nutty is not dead after all, having escaped. All is going well when alas! a horde of savages surround the travellers! They are especially sweet on Piggy in whom they see a toothsome morsel, but thanks to her mystic powers, the poor girl hypnotises the savage set to guard her and they all succeed in escaping, only, however, to fall into the hands of some ragged, insolent pirates who bring them before the ruler of the island, who turns out to be no other than the powerful Rajah of Yeahbo. The presence of Piggy rejuvenates the Rajah but offends the jealous Punkette.

Nutty and Cremo, intent upon getting that million dollars, plan a flight. Too late! The rajah discovers all of the two fugitives have to hide themselves behind the statue of the god Buddha. A religious ceremony commences. Punkette, the inexorable priestess of the divinity, demands nothing less in her invocation of the goddess than the death of Piggy, accusing her of coming to brave the god in his own eternal temple. The fanatics break loose, weapons agleam. Nutty and Piggy come out of their hiding place and all is riot and confusion! The three racers fly like zebras.

One fine day the trio arrive at the enchanted isle, the goal of their mad race. How great is their surprise when they find "The Lyre" in the hands of a gigantic man-monkey. The monkey, astonished at their advent, flies away with the precious paper but Piggy once more resorts to her mystic powers. She hyponotizes the beast and at last succeeds in obtaining possession of "The Lyre." And now for home. They divide the journal between them. Our racers arrive home with all speed. To get to the capital, Nutty and Piggy charter a balloon, whilst the up-to-date Cremo must patronize the latest invention, and hangs on to an aeroplane. Hard luck pursues Cremo. The biplane takes fire in the air and makes a miserable descent in the middle of the lake. Cremo hangs on to the trolley of a car. Truly his life may be said to hang upon a thread. Once again the three friends find themselves reunited in a motor car that Cremo drives to the barrier where it unloads its precious contents. With all speed they fly to the office of "The Lyre," only to find, alas! that the proprietor is bankrupt and has fled leaving only the proverbial "rabbit" in the till and this rabbit is the only prize received by the redoubtable three for their mad chase to the Pacific Isle.

"HEART BEATS" or "THE USELESS CRIME" (Three Parts).—Lady Linderdale is dying and at her last gasp her old servant, Richard, swears a solemn oath to her he will watch over her child who is the sole heir. Three years have passed. Lord Linderlade, the celebrated poet, has composed an opera in which the famous artiste, Hazel Clarke, takes part. At the rehearsal and on the evening of her triumph, the poet is fascinated by her and asks for her hand. Hazel is flattered but does not accept his offer. She loves and is loved by Arthur Morris, a colleague in art, and she is faithful to her betrothed. However, old Clarke has ruined himself at the gaming tables and by his deep cunning touches his daughter's heart by making her forsee their sad future of poverty and her consequent impossibility of marrying Morris and her necessity for marrying the rich poet. Hazel yields. The news of of such a marriage terrifies Richard. He makes entreaties to his master but to no avail. The child is to have a step-mother but Richard decides he will watch over him ready to stoop to crime. He has sworn it.

As Hazel is now a rich woman her father continually demands money. Her husband who is deeply attached to her one day shows her his will. Richard also has seen it. It is in favor of the woman. He feels an intense hatred for his master and mistress. He does not yet know how but he intends to destroy the will. Hazel has locked it up in a desk in her boudoir and substituted another will. Morris cannot make up his mind to go away without seeing the woman he loves, and writes imploring her to grant him an interview at night in the pavillion of the garden. The letter is intercepted by Richard who begins his deadly web. He shows it to Lord Linderdale who decides to prevent the affront to his name so accepts his servant's advice and feigns a departure. In the night Lord Linderdale decides to kill Morris, but a hand of iron grips him.....strangles him.....his revolver falls. The stalwart servant lifts him up and takes him toward the river into which he throws him. He then hastens to his master's study and destroys the will.

Morris goes sadly away. Not even a single kiss has he had from the woman who willingly sacrificed her happiness for her father. While Morris crosses the avenue he sees something shining brightly on the ground and picks up the poet's revolver. Lord Linderdale has been rescued and brought back to recovery. His wife is anxious over his absence. Richard feigns ignorance of the reason for his delay. Hazel remembers the document telling how, in case of death, the poet's property would lawfully pass into the hands of his wife. Richard spies every movement, sees all, reads the few lines and is thunderstruck. He has only made the winning game of that woman! Richard must get rid of her. He denounces her to the police. Evidence is against Hazel and she is arrested on the charge of having murdered her husband.

Morris, having learned all from the newspapers, hastens to save her. He declares that he is the murderer producing before the eyes of the jury the revolver which he had taken from the poet on that tragic night. Again does Richard find himself powerless. The castle is now left in his care. In the meantime, the missing lord who is supposed to be dead, enters his castle by stealth. From a deserted room he will be able to watch like a ghost. During the night a terrible vision haunts the troubled dreams of Richard. He runs from his room. Mad with terror he reaches the drawing room and there surprises a house breaker at work. After throwing the rascal to the floor, Richard becomes like a person struck by lightning. The thief has an extraordinary resemblance to his deceased master. A substitution takes place. Richard will present the poet in court. Lured by the promise of a high reward the thief puts on the poet's clothes. Linderdale observes all and smiles. Richard is happy. He will have another will drawn up by the false Linderdale bequeathing all his fortune to the little one. Hazel finds a change in Lord Linderdale. The disguised thief knows that some millions in shares belonging to Lord Linderdale are in the hands of the family lawyer. He telephones to him and tells him to bring all the shares at once. The enormous sum is now in the hands of the thief! However, Richard watches and that same night surprises the thief as he is trying to escape with the stolen fortune. In a hand to hand struggle they fall together on the carpet. The petroleum escapes from a broken lamp, catches fire and in a few minutes the fire has spread. A ghost then appears, two hands are seen stretching out and the three disappear. Richard recognizes his real master and stands like one petrified. He attempts to make his escape but it is too late. The flames surround him and make him their prey. The poet succeeds in saving his child. Since he is believed to be dead and knowing that by his marriage to Hazel he has broken her heart, what would be the use of returning to life? Dickson is found dead in the ruins.

A year passes. Morris and Hazel are married. A letter from Mr. Douglas, the family lawyer, arrives saying "The late Lord Linderdale who met his death in the fire of Linderdale palace last year has bequeathed to you 100,000 francs....."

"MAN'S ENEMY" (Biograph K. & E.—Three Parts).—Warwickshire, England.—Warriner and his neighbor, Gen. Sir Arthur Stanton, through a dispute, become enemies. Warriner, starting on a hunting trip, accidentally discharges his gun and is killed. Tom Warriner believes his father was murdered by Sir Arthur and swears vengeance. Grace Lisle is Sir Arthur's ward and prospective daughter-in-law. Her brother Fred, is Harry Stanton's pal.

Tom Warriner, now known as "Drake," is proprietor of a gambling house. His accomplice is Sarah Banks, an adventuress. Fred Lisle becomes infatuated with Sarah and loans her lodge funds entrusted to his care. Harry discovers Fred's haunt. Drake, recognizing Harry as the son of General Stanton, determines to ruin him. Harry meets Sarah and is fascinated. Sarah tells Tom she intends to marry Harry. Fred implores Sarah to return the loan, but she only laughs. Drake brings about Harry's downfall. Harry is so infatuated with Sarah that he marries her. Fred confesses to Sir Arthur, who promises to make good the money if Sarah does not. They visit Sarah. Harry in an intoxicated condition enters with Tom. Sir Arthur is dumbfounded and demands an explanation. Harry tells him that Sarah is his wife.

Years pass and Fred Lisle, now a clergyman, advises Sir Arthur, who is in poor health, to go to the Riviera for a rest. On the Riviera, Harry, Count Lanski, Drake and Ikey (a bookmaker) gamble until Harry loses all his money the Count being the winner. Sarah starts a flirtation with the Count. Harry is about to seek solace in drink when he meets Grace. She begs him to stop drinking and he promises. Drake, worried over the money he owes the Count, learns that Sarah is about to elope with him and tells Harry who insults the Count, resulting in a duel. Drakes sees a chance to have the Count killed. He loads only one pistol. The signal is given to fire and the Count falls dead. Drake tells Harry that he is Tom Warriner and that he intends to swear that Harry murdered the Count. Ikey, a secret witness, forces Tom to inform the crowd that the Count committed suicide.

Later in London, Sir Arthur, learning that Harry is in the city, searches for him. Polly and Adolphe, formerly servants in Drake's gambling house, now married, conduct a lodging house. Mrs. Sanders quarrels with her husband, Bill. Grace and Fred appear and interfere. In the crowd that has gathered are Sarah and Drake. Fred questions them as to Harry's whereabouts, but they plead ignorance Harry is now working as a watchman. Tom and Sarah bribe Sanders to get Harry intoxicated. Ikey notifies Grace where Harry is working. Harry is discharged and Sanders takes his place. Sarah learns that Grace is coming for Harry. She bargains with Sanders to spoil Grace's beauty by throwing vitriol in her face. Grace finds Sanders, who has fallen asleep, in Harry's place, and is about to awaken him when his child volunteers to lead her to the overseer to obtain Harry's new address. Sarah is furious because her plan is foiled and shakes Sanders, who wakes up and dashes the vitriol in her face by mistake.

Ikey takes Harry to the lodging house and Tom follows them. The police, thinking Harry threw the vitriol, are about to arrest him, when Ikey and Polly prove that Sanders is the guilty man. Sanders is arrested. Harry attacks Tom. Mrs. Sanders is taking care of Harry at his father's home. Sir Arthur forgives Harry. Ikey, in the meantime, has struck it rich and loans Tom money. Tom decides to desert Sarah. She pleads with him and they have a fight during which Tom kills her. He is arrested and dies in prison. Harry and Grace are married and Sir Arthur at last realizes his fondest dream.

NEW YORK CITY

Canadian forests. But on his death bed his father made a confession, that twenty years ago he met a squaw of the Ojibway tribe and that a girl child was born. She was now up in Nipissing country with a French-Canadian family, who adopted her by arrangement with the father. Old Beaubien's last words to his son exacted a promise that the boy would find his half sister, educate and care for her and give her a liberal share of the estate.

As soon as affairs were settled Jules started on his quest to find Annette. Arriving in the Nipissing country, he found that the family moved from the valley, but he was informed that a woodsman, Baptiste Le Grande, could tell him all about the girl, as he had been her sweetheart. He loved the girl with all the strength of his rough manhood, but a city man came along and betrayed her. Baptiste tried to tell the story, but his rage would not permit him to be coherent and Father Paul continued. He told Jules that the seducer abandoned the girl and had gone back to America. Annette, knowing she was disgraced, ran away from her foster parents and wandered to the camps where the women of the trappers tried to care for her; she became delirious, but she never mentioned the man's name. When her child was born she wandered out into the storm with her babe in her arms, lied down in the snow and died, and the wolves ate her and the child. The rage of Jules and Baptiste was terrible. They swore to find the man and kill him. Baptiste took a cruifix from his bosom, both men kissed the symbol, and for two years the quest of vengeance continued. In the Indian summer Jules heard that frequently parties of engineers would quarter at Andrew McTavish's house in the forest. Here Jules and Baptiste resolved to put up for a while. Two other men arrived, Mr. McDonald, a civil engineer, and his assistant, Mr. Huntley, who were surveying for a Canadian railroad. MacDonald was a splendid specimen of physical manhood, about forty years of age and very entertaining. His ability at his profession made him rich and with all he was a man of courage and likeable.

McTavish's daughter, Hilda, a fascinating girl, did the cooking and housekeeping, and it was not surprising that MacDonald and Jules soon noticed that each were contesting for the smiles of the Scotchman's daughter. Hilda was not adverse to the pleasantries of the good-looking boarders, for her life was far from being a happy one, her mother not being able to stand the irascible McTavish had run away when Hilda was a child and the father vented his revenge and hatred upon the daughter. Soon the rivalry between Jules and MacDonald became an open book. Jules loved Hilda, while the other man was simply playing for a dishonorable advantage. One day the men admitted their rivalry face to face. Jules was willing to play the game fair. The rogue laughed in the other man's face, admitted that he had a wife in America, but boasted of his power over women. In his bravado he told of an affair some years ago with a little half breed girl up in the Nipissing country. It was the story of Annette. Jules would have killed him on the spot, but he was a man of honor; he could not assassinate, he must fight this fiend. Then he must tell also Baptiste, who would also want to kill him, and commit this deed he would if Jules fell in the fight. McDonald, feeling he was losing ground with Hilda, planned to work her ruin through the father. He told McTavish that he had a good mother in America that would care for and educate Hilda and that then he would marry her.

The old Scotchman was only too willing to get rid of the girl and demanded of her that she would go with MacDonald. Jules had told Hilda of the good love and the bad love and she learned to love Jules. When McTavish ordered her to go with McDonald she resisted; the old man in his rage would have seized her by the throat and strangled her, but Jules bore him to the floor of the cabin, while Baptiste from outside the window covered MacDonald with his Winchester. The fight was desperate and long, but Jules seized Hilda and, with Baptiste and Huntley, who discovered his master's villainy, the four hastened to the creek and in a canoe which had been furnished with supplies for the trip, made towards the Canadian railway for Montreal. MacDonald followed and Jules left the party at a landing to meet him. A desperate duel was fought, in which MacDonald was killed, and Jules and his party after burying the body hastened to his home and happiness.

IN TUNE WITH THE WILD (Selig—Three Parts—July 31).—Robert Wayne, a sturdy British missionary, stationed in South Africa, is cheered by the presence of his charming wife and baby daughter, Edith. The brother of Mrs. Wayne is living with them, and puts in his time enjoyably hunting big game, while one of his duties is to bring the mail into the interior where the missionary lives, from the nearest mail station. Wayne and his family live in a negro village where the natives are especially friendly to them and where their eminence as white people, give them a certain dignity and prestige which makes life more comfortable for them under the circumstances. In the mail, one day, a letter comes to Robert Wayne announcing that he has fallen heir to fifty thousand pounds as a legacy, and he at once determines to return to England with his family for the purpose of taking over his fortune. In the big covered veldt wagon, the party begins the treck toward civilization.

One of the playmates of Edith has been a little negro boy, the son of the chief of the village. They have been great chums, so after the big wagon departs, he steals away from the village, and, by taking a short-cut through the jungle, is enabled to strike the party in camp. However, while on his way through the forest, he notes the approach of a large party of natives, and secreting himself in the hollow trunk of a tree, he overhears the plot to capture and destory the party of whites. Before he reaches the camp, the treacherous chief of the hostile war party, visits the camp and persuades the missionary to go to the assistance of a wounded native, this being a ruse on his part to deplete the fighting force at the wagon, and therefore make its capture more readily accomplished. After walking a short distance from camp, Wayne is struck down from behind by an assegi after which the chief rejoins his party, and they surround the wagon, wounding the defenders, killing the little negro boy and setting fire to the camp. The chief of the friendly tribe, whose son has run away to join the white party, goes in search of the boy with a large following of his villagers. They arrive at the wagon camp in time to rescue Mrs. Wayne and little Edith, together with Mrs. Wayne's brother, and take them in safety back to the village.

Robert Wayne recovers consciousness after several hours and hurriedly makes his way back to the burned wagon. His mentality succumbs to the terrible catastrophe as he believes the entire party to have been destroyed. Insane with grief and horror, he staggers into the jungle and becomes a wild man—fearless and disregardful of the dangers of wild animals.

Mrs. Wayne and Edith, accompanied by Mrs. Wayne's brother, are discovered seventeen years later in England living a quiet life, while their thoughts frequently turn to the husband and father whose life they believe was taken by the savage natives in South Africa. Robert Wayne becomes a hairy, powerful wild man, and his adventures with leopards, lions and other ferocious beasts of the jungle, furnish many of the most interesting features of this picture play. Capt. Jones, a British sportsman, and party meet the wild man of the jungle who protests against their killing his ferocious pets, his appearance occurring at a time when a photograph is being taken of a huge lion which has just been killed. When the picture is developed, it shows the wild man distinctly. Upon the return of the party to England, Capt. Jones meets Edith Wayne and shows her the photograph, which she recognizes as her father. A rescue party sets out from England on the following day to locate the missing Robert Wayne. Edith and her uncle go with the party.

The wild man has wandered from his jungle camp, and Edith, in her eagerness to aid in the search, rides off alone and is captured by a hostile band belonging to the village of Chief Boola. Within a few hours of this incident, Robert Wayne, the wild man, is also captured by another party from the same village. Chief Boola has established a business of catching and selling wild animals to English hunters, and having heard of the power possessed by the wild man of the jungle over the beasts of prey, determines to throw him into a huge pit where he keeps the wild animals, which he has on hand ready for sale, and enjoy the spectacle of seeing the wild man control them. Boola tells Edith that he will add her to his harem, but her horror and dismay are so marked, that he determines to throw her into the wild animal pit together with the "white man."

Captain Jones, on his return to camp, discovers the absence of Edith and rides off hastily in search of her. He stumbles upon a large party of English hunters who are on their way to the village of Boola to buy wild animals. He is perishing from thirst and, upon being revived, accompanies the party. Upon nearing the village, they are met by a jealous wife from the harem of Boola, who, out of revenge and jealousy, tells the party the frightful fate assigned to the wild man of the jungle and the "white maiden." After a brisk encounter between the warriors of Boola and the members of the white party, they reach the village in time to witness the domination of the jungle beasts by Robert Wayne, who has recovered his mentality upon beholding Edith, whom he recognizes; and the final scene shows the intrepid Captain Jones clasping Edith in his arms, while the benevolent countenance of the once wild man of the jungle beams upon them with fatherly pride.

WHITE DOVE'S SACRIFICE (Three Parts).—In the opening scene, little Emma starts out with her father and mother to visit some neighbors. Before reaching the neighboring ranch, they meet the school teacher and one of her pupils, Billy, who informs Emma's parents that the Indians are on the warpath again. Taking the teacher and Billy into the wagon, they turn about and start back for home. They are met by one of the cow-boys, who has ridden to overtake them and apprise them that the Indians are between them and the ranch. They discover that the Indians are gaining on them and take refuge in a deserted log hut. During the fight that ensues, Emma's father and mother and the school mistress are killed by the Indians, the cow-boy is wounded and left for dead. Little Emma has hidden away from the Indians and Billy, less fortunate, is taken by them and adopted by the tribe. After the Indians leave, Emma crawls out of her hiding place, the cow-boy recovers consciousness, and together they escape.

Ten years later we are given a view of the Indian camp, with Billy as the adopted son of the chief of the tribe. Little Emma has grown into a dashing young lady and is keeping house for the cow-boy, who has brought her up from a little child. On one of Emma's rides she overtakes a coon, which crawls out to the end of a branch overhanging a river. Emma, in crawling out on the branch to capture the coon, falls off into the river, and is rescued by Billy, who to all appearances is a full blooded Indian. Emma is frightened by Billy and starts on the run for home, dropping her hat in the excitement. She has another adventure on the way, being treed by a large black bear. Billy has followed her, seeking an opportunity to return her hat, and arrives just in time to kill the bear and again save Emma's life. This time, Emma is not quite so fearful of her rescuer, and an acquaintance is formed. On Billy's return to the Indian camp, he is informed that he must marry White Dove, the daughter of the chief. Billy having fallen in love with Emma, refuses, and is made prisoner, sentenced to die at dawn if he does not obey the chief's command.

White Dove, who loves Billy, learns of his love for the white maiden and in the unselfishness of her affection aids him to escape. Billy's identity is finally established; he renounces the Indians and their customs and once more takes his place among his white brethren. The acquaintance of Emma and Billy ripens into mutual love, and the story leaves them happy together. White Dove takes up her daily life again in the camp, heart-broken at her loss, yet consoled by the thought tha the man she loved had been made happy by her sacrifice.

THE CALL OF THE NORTH (Five Parts).—Galen Albert and Graeham Stewart are employees at an important trading post in the great Northwest. Albert marries Elodie, Rand, one of the traders, instills jealous thoughts in Albert's mind, pointing to Stewart as the guilty man. Alber, who is factor at the post, condemns Stewart to travel the journey of death. Stewart makes the long journey, first giving his son to an Indian woman. Stewart dies after five days and Galen Albert is made factor at Conjuror's House Post, the most important in the North. This constitutes the prologue.

After twenty years young Stewart, a free trader, defying the laws of the trading company, is captured by the factor's Indians, and condemned to make the journey of death as did his father. The factor's daughter, Virginia, meets and falls in love with Ned Stewart and promises to aid him. The journey of death consists of a man being compelled to walk across the bleak, barren, snow covered plains, five hundred miles to civilization, without food or arms.

Young Ned conspires with Picard and procures a rifle with which to secure food while on the journey of death. The rifle, however, is taken away from him and he is sent on the horrible trip. Virginia's pleadings are of no avail.

Rand, who originally caused the breach between Albert and Stewart's father, witnesses Picard giving the rifle to Stewart and tells Picard's sweetheart, Julie, that unless she "throw Picard over" and become his wife, he will tell the factor of Picard's traitoriously aiding the condemned Stewart. Julie, at an opportune moment, shoots and vitally injures Rand, who confesses with his dying breath to having wrongfully injured Graham Stewart. The factor relents and sends a rescue party for young Stewart, who has by this time reached civilization. Realizing that Virginia loves Stewart, the factor sends her to meet him and the brave woodsman begins life anew with his bride from the wilds.

THE PHANTOM THIEF (Three Parts).—Wildemar, a man of wealth and influence, has been robbed of a pearl necklace worth many thousands of dollars. His secretary, who has been the only man in the room when the robbery took place, is accused of the theft and arrested. Nick Winter, the great detective, is called to unravel the case but cannot find any proof that the secretary has had anything to do with it. He has an inspiration and has himself appointed as secretary to Wildemar. Wearing a disguise that prevents Wildemar from recognizing him he discovers that his employer is in great need of money. He also finds out that Wildemar has put in a claim for insurance on the stolen necklace.

While in the library Wildemar gets a letter from one of his friends enclosing ten thousand dollars. He is called out for a few minutes and when he returns he discovers that the money is missing. He accuses the new secretary and to save himself Nick Winter has to tell who he is. They go out of the room for a few minutes and when they return they find that it has been upset and that several articles are missing. Nick is invited to stay for dinner and while attempting to carve the chicken runs across the pearl necklace basted within the fowl. They all leave the table and rush to the butcher around the corner but he knows nothing of it. As they are talking to him a woman customer comes in and complains that she has found more than she ordered in a cake. Investigation reveals the great detective's pipe, one of the missing articles. Winter is again momentarily stumped but seeing a box move in the yard he rushes out and discovers underneath a sewer opening. Winter leaves his hat and coat above while he descends to investigate the mysterious underground chamber and when he returns after having found nothing he discovers to his amazement that both his hat and coat are gone.

They return to the house where the first thing that confronts Winter in the library is his hat and coat. As he stands deeply thinking of the many mysteries they have encountered the lights are suddenly turned out and Winter has a happy thought. It leads him a merry chase through, over, around, between, up, down, and into some of the most amusing places and incidents imaginable. But he gets there, lands the culprit and unravels the mystery. Who is the culprit? That's the question and before you find out you will have enjoyed a laugh feast that will make you feel like an optimist of the first water.

WHEN ROME RULED (Five Parts).—In one of the Roman colonies in North Africa lives with her father a beautiful young Christian girl, Nydia. A high priest of Jupiter, one of the principal Roman gods, sees her and desires to have her for one of the vestal virgins. He sends his attendants to seize her but is prevented by the passing of Caius, the son of the Roman governor. Caius is very much impressed by the beauty of Nydia and after leaving her safely at her home rides on to the court.

The high priest, angry at being so easily thwarted, takes some of his attendants and goes to the home of Nydia to seize her. They are not successful although in the struggle Nydia's father is killed and their home is burned. Nydia escapes to the desert and hides in a cave. A shepherd passes and one of his sheep is carried off and eaten by a lion. The cave where Nydia hides is the lair of the lion and she is terrified as he comes in and stands on a rock near her and roars at her. The shepherd goes to the city to get help to kill the wild beast and lands at the palace of Caius just as a large company are celebrating the arrival of the young woman whom Caius is to marry. He leaves the feast and goes to help the shepherd. They find the cave, capture the lion and at the same time discover Nydia. Caius takes Nydia to his father's house and declares his intention of keeping her under his care. His father objects, she being a Christian. In spite of protests Caius places Nydia in a home, where he goes to visit her. On one of his visits he is followed by the highpriest and his father. The high priest enters the room and accuses Nydia of seducing Caius. In a struggle that follows Caius kills the high priest. His father has Caius carried off by two attendants. He accuses Nydia of the crime. In spite of her protests she is condemned to be thrown to the lions. Caius' betrothed tells him of the event and he rushes to the lions' den to help Nydia. His betrtothed, who has been instrumental in stirring up trouble, opens the door of the den to watch with satisfaction the end of her rival. Caius sees the door open and seizing Nydia, makes his escape. They manage to escape to the desert, where Caius adopts Christianity.

WHEN A WOMAN LOVES (Three Parts).—Henry Warring, a middle-aged business man, brings his pretty bride, Eleanora, into the beautiful home he has built and furnished for her. Delightful surprises meet Eleanora at every turn, and in rapture with the bright rosy atmosphere of her new life, she fails to understand a growing disinterest on the part of her husband. The truth is that Warring has found that his business affairs have become involved during his recent absence, and that only the closest application on his part will save him.

Harry Lighthall, society idol, bachelor and friend of Warring's, has met Eleanora at the country club and is later given the freedom of the Warring home. Eleanora's pretty winning ways attract him, and taking advantage of Warring's apparent neglect of his wife, Lighthall steps in and under the pretense of comforting her, tries to win her heart. To please his passing fancy he has spurned Mary Bayliss, an old and true friend, who when she discovers his fickleness writes to Warring telling him of the attentions which are being pressed upon his girl-bride by Lighthall.

Warring's shock at hearing of the infidelity of his friend and the faithlessness of his wife, added to his business troubles nearly unminds him. Momentarily unbalanced, in desperation he contemplates suicide. Having seen Eleanora go away with Lighthall to a brilliant society masked ball to which he repeatedly refused to go he suddenly changes his mind and follows. Masked, he sees Lighthall take Eleanora, dressed in a Yama-Yama costume, into an ante-room, where he presses his suit but is sternly repulsed. The ball breaks up shortly, and Warring starts to follow the couple home. On the way they unintentionally give him the slip by returning to get a forgotten cloak.

Warring returns, goes to his wife's room full of a determination to end the affair then and there. Eleanora, who has been home all the evening, having sent the maid in her place when her husband refused to go, is dumbfounded. There is a scene in the lower hall in which tragedy is about to enter when the door opens and Lighthall and the maid burst into the room. Hesitating a moment, Warring suddenly sees the real situation. Eleanora has been only too true to him and he feels his baseness in suspecting her. Raising his poor little sobbing child-wife from the floor he takes her to him and asks her forgiveness, while Lighthall, caught in his duplicity, leaves the house shamefaced—an outcast.

"THE PERILS OF PAULINE" (Tenth Episode).—Pauline has been through so many hairbreadth escapes which the villainous Owen and his henchman, Hicks, have arranged for her in the hope that she would meet with an untimely end, that Harry has at last rebelled against his position of protector. He claims that he should be allowed to arrange all future escapades. Pauline consents to this and Harry plans something of his own that will entail no danger. But he calculates without the villains. Owen hears his plans and makes arrangements to do the same thing, but with men of his own who will not be so careful as the ones Harry has made the arrangements with. Harry's plan has been to take Pauline with him to see the work of some smugglers. He has cooked the plan up with some of his friends to show Pauline something that will be near enough to the real thing to impress her.

However, Owen overhears the plan and immediately gets in touch with Hicks, who goes to the wharfs and picks up some of the hangers on. He pays them well and drills them in their parts. They come to the house and ask for Pauline. The butler refuses them entrance but Owen carries the message to Pauline, who thinks they are the men sent by Harry. In spite of the apparent protests of Owen, Pauline insists on going away with them. They take her to a lonely deserted inn along the coast and lock her up. She discovers a telephone on the wall and, having become suspicious of their inttentions, tries to phone Harry. She only gets the message started when her guard discovers her and tears the phone out. The men become alarmed and take her away to another place. Harry has heard enough to give him an idea of the location of her place of detention and starts to get her. When he arrives he finds that she has been removed. The pirates have left a trail which he follows. He loses it but meets a boy who has seen them pass and with fresh information he locates her prison. The men have taken her to an old lighthouse some distance from the shore and have rowed away. Harry and the boy rush to the life-saving station but find that the lifieboat crew have gone out on a call, taking their boat with them. They discover a rocket gun and a breeches buoy, which they take to the top of the cliffs. Loading the gun, Harry shoots a line to the lighthouse and passes Pauline a cable and the life buoy. She starts to come ashore but is seen by the pirates, who give pursuit. Harry sees that they will overtake Pauline before he can pull her ashore so he loads the gun again and, taking a desperate chance, fires at their boat. His aim is true and the sinking of the boat enables Pauline to get safely ashore.

VENTILATION COOLING HEATING

Heating and cooling problem revolutionized by Typhoon System.

You keep cool in front of a desk fan and not in back; apply this common sense and blow the air into your theatre.

A 48" Typhoon Multiblade Blower has sixteen blades, an ordinary exhaust fan has six; it is the blades that do the business.

A Typhoon Tubular Air Warmer will heat and ventilate at the same time.

The low price of effective apparatus will surprise you. Catalogue "W" gives information.

Mr. Beverly B. Dobbs, Agent Day & Night Screens, Seattle, Wash. June 23, 1914.

My Dear Mr. Dobbs: Notwithstanding your very substantial guarantee, and even after we had given you an order for a Day & Night Screen, candor compels me to admit that I was sceptical concerning its merits. It has now been in use for a considerable period and not only does it meet our requirements most fully, but it has our unqualified endorsement. Quite apart from the fact that it is absolutely the best Screen that I have ever used, or seen used, it is worthy of serious consideration from the viewpoint of economy alone. It serves to reduce the consumption of current very materially, and we note a gratifiying decrease in our "juice" bills since it has been in use. I can conscientiously recommend it to any exhibitor who is striving for perfection in matters of projection, and you are quite at liberty to use this endorsement in any legitimate way. With sincere best wishes, I am Cordially yours, (Signed) E. L. DAVENPORT, Manager Lyric Amusement Co.

THE PHANTOSCOPE

If you would use motion pictures as an aid in salesmanship, you need THE PHANTOSCOPE. If you would use motion pictures as an aid in efficiency instruction, you need THE PHANTOSCOPE. If you would use motion pictures as an aid in education you need THE PHANTOSCOPE. If you would have a machine you carry as conveniently as a suit case, can set up in any room in just seventy seconds, and without tools other than your two hands, you need THE PHANTOSCOPE. If there's any doubt in your mind about its value to you in YOUR work, just note the great number of users of THE PHANTOSCOPE. Just as with the automobile, and as one would naturally expect, there have been striking improvements made since the first PHANTOSCOPE. And yet there are many machines which have been in almost continuous service, since the very first, and they are running smoother and sweeter than ever.

The price is $100 complete—Motor driven $125.

Film Quality

Quality in the film—quality from a technical photographic standpoint is as important to the Exhibitor as is interest in the story that the film tells.

There's one film that's recognized the world over as the standard of quality—that is always used by those whose effort it is to give the Exhibitors the very best goods and the very best service—Eastman film.

And it is identifiable. Look for "Eastman" on the perforated margin.

MAKE 'EM YOURSELF SLIDES

Make them yourself. Written with pen and ink or typewriter. Three minutes to make a slide. Used for advertising slides, to announce future or feature programmes, for chorus slides when chorus slide is missing. We send four colors of gelatin. The slides look well and anyone can make them. They are handy also for announcing vaudeville acts. In fact, they may be readily used for anything you may wish to say to your audience.

For the sum of $3.50 we will send, by parcel post, prepaid and insured, the following:
24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. Address:

KIMBLE FANS

The only alternating current fan that reduces electric current consumption (and consequently ventilating cost) in direct proportion to every speed reduction. Run it at ¼ speed for a small "house" and it uses up only ¼ as much current as when you run it full speed for a packed house. Kimble Ventilation is the most economical—also the most efficient. Write for the Red Catalog and get the facts.

MOTIOGRAPH SATISFACTION

What is there about the MOTIOGRAPH that makes MOTIOGRAPH owners so loyal, so enthusiastic? You will have to admit their feeling is different, unusual, remarkable, compared with the Exhibitors satisfaction with other make machines. NOW WHY? The answer is worth knowing if you are seeking the best machine made. Talk with a hundred MOTIOGRAPH owners using the different models from the beginning many years ago. They will all tell you:

"My Motiograph runs always, I can always depend on it. Such a thing as a machine failing to run or break down or wear out, never enters my mind. From what my friends tell me I know it costs me less to run and maintain my Motiograph than they pay out for the machines of other makes, and I notice they all come to see my machine in operation when they want to buy and will ask 'Will you buy another Motiograph?' Yes, when I buy my next machine, but, I'm not in any hurry about it, my Motiograph is as sound and serviceable as any machine on the market today, regardless of its several years' service."

That is what Motiograph users will tell you if you ask them. After all, that is what you want to buy—Satisfaction—No matter what you have in mind to spend, put in Motiograph Satisfaction, and you will get your money's worth. Write for catalogue.

"In view of the new Era of Palatial Theatre Building created by the advent of the two-hour photoplay, it is good to know that the problems of seating the vast crowds, attracted by a new art's increasing vogue are simplified greatly through the publication of the booklet, 'Seating for Modern Theatres.'

"After seeing this concrete and informative publication, I am inclined to the belief that every theatrical manager as well as every caterer to the public entertainment owes it to himself to mark well the vast improvements in theatre seating, and also to render his public such service as may be meted out to it through the now possible comfort while seated in a playhouse." We quote from one of thousands of commendatory letters received by us referring to THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY:

"You've set the pace in film productions with THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY. Certainly you have brought to light the finest photography, the most beautiful settings, the best balanced cast of characters I have ever seen in any photoplay. The acting is exceptionally good. That this movie will establish a new record for attendance is a foregone conclusion."

Mexican War Feature in 3 thrilling Parts

Produced by Colorado Motion Picture Co.
Released by Warner's Features, Inc.,

BORDER

This stirring story of the Mexican border-land is conceded by critics to be the best film of its kind yet produced. Its remarkable success is due to the originality of the scenario, the realism of the pictures and the splendid acting of Miss Grace McHugh, the gifted star who lost her life in its production. It is somewhat consoling to reflect that in this great drama Miss McHugh has bequeathed to us an example of her work at the height of her powers. The part of Anita, the Mexican smuggler's daughter, is exactly suited to her. From her first meeting with the Texas Ranger, through all the intrigues, conspiracies, fighting and love-making, to her break-neck night-ride for the troops to save her sweetheart and back in the gray dawn at their head, her work is marked by superb technique, marvelous poise and undaunted courage.

WHAT THE CRITICS SAY :

From the Motion Picture News:—"The picture can take its place with the foremost pictures of its kind. Warner's Features control the picture and in their projection room, where the censors and reviewers witnessed the production, it was acclaimed without one dissenting voice the best yet."

From the New York Telegraph:—"To the obvious advantage of being a timely play, 'Across the Border' adds the assets of good photography, good action and a setting which makes an excellent background against which to project lively action of the hard-riding, hard-shooting type."

ALL LOVE EXCELLING

A story of a woman's sacrifice for the man she loves—how she saves him from disgrace with his wife, and his son from death and disappointment—all at the cost of her own happiness. A Pathe American-made feature in three parts, demonstrating a great and unselfish devotion. From Washington through the Crimean War the plot carries one through stirring unexpected action.

THE MASKED MOTIVE

An exceptional dramatic masterpiece in 5 parts with a plot full of sudden surprises and unexpected situations. The story starts with two happy marriages but the scheming of a disappointed suitor includes in his destructive plans even the children of the unfortunate double alliance. The story is distinguished by acting of the highest caliber, by the clever intricacy of plot, and by the rapidity with which the pictures leap from one unexpected situation to another.

Every Wednesday and Friday—a super-excellent Multiple Reel Feature. Every Tuesday—American made one or two reel Comedy. Every other Monday—"Perils of Pauline." Mondays when Pauline is not released—Short Foreign Comedy—Cartoon Comedy, or short scenic Educational film in natural colors.

THE PERILS OF PAULINE

The magazines build up their big circulations by serial stories. Pauline and her Perils are to the moving picture theatres what serial stories are to the big circulation magazines. When going to the movies, folks always look to see where the "Perils" are playing—your surest and biggest puller.

PAULINE PUTS PROFITS IN YOUR POCKET

Colonel Heeza Liar

The famous one reel comedy character by the inimitable J. R. Bray. The Colonel is a character that gets 'em just below the third vest button. His next adventure, on "The River of Doubt," will double your patrons up with laughter.

THE DIVINE SHAKESPEAREAN DRAMA

Made at Venice, Italy!!!

By the Photo Drama Company. THE SUPER FILM—By All Odds the Most Pretentious, Beautiful and Accurately-Screened Version of Shakespearean Stories!

MADE AT VENICE, ITALY. That's a Tremendous advertising Feature in itself! VENICE, rendezvous of the modern tourist—A very fountain-head of Romance and Adventure! The waterways of Historic Venice with its tales, ten centuries old, of Passionate Loves and Fierce Vendettas—the indolent, dreamy sweep of these Gondola-ridden highways are scenes of the quaintest stories in any language!

FOR THE MAKING OF OTHELLO the City Fathers declared a half-holiday—canals were closed to modern commerce, leaving only the aged palaces, the gayly-costumed players and the clicking cameras of the Photo Drama Company.

In OTHELLO, we offer a real masterpiece. It is the first of Shakespeare's stories filmed in its proper environment, as the Master would have wished.

THREE SPLENDID MONEY-GETTING SUBJECTS YOU CAN HAVE RIGHT NOW!

They're making money every minute—these three!!! Call up any General Film Office (Special Feature Department) and make a date!

We vouch for them absolutely! From the standpoint of story, photography and general dull-season possibilities, we believe them to have no equals in inexpensive summer attractions.

Let us suggest you try them.

ANNE BOLEYN

A story of the Second Wife of Henry VIII. Every School Child Knows the History of Her Ill-Fated, Doom-Laden Marriage. Anne deposed Queen Catherine, only to give way in time to the new Court Beauty, Jane Seymour. The Courtship, Marriage and Death of Anne Boleyn is one of the Cruelest, Weirdest incidents in the annals of English History. As a Picture, It's a WINNER! THREE PARTS

A KINGDOM AT STAKE

The Pretty Child Queen is Marked by Anarchists for Murder. But, Luckily, her Native Sweetness wins the Heart of the Chief Conspirator, Her daily Companion and Instructor. How the Plot failed.....How the well-meaning but misguided revolutionists were condemned to Die, only to be pardoned at the Eleventh Hour by their childish, loving little Monarch, makes, we firmly believe, the most pleasing, dainty, thoroughly-charming hot weather offering we have seen this summer. Already many theatres have cashed in on "A Kingdom at Stake." Have You? THREE PARTS

OTHELLO

Truly a wonderful subject, made from the Divine Shakespearean Tragedy of that Name. Staged at Venice, Italy, in the environment of the Original, Following Closely the Thread of Shakespeare's Beautiful Story. But—And Here's a Vital Point—You Need be no Shakespeare Student to enjoy the wonders of his written story. All its dramatic power and intensity have been retained three-fold in the film version. Again we say, A Truly Wonderful Subject. You will find in it great box-office possibilities. If you haven't booked it, Do It Now! FIVE PARTS

Facts and Comments

WE think it our duty to call attention to the follies of official censorship and to the evils that result from it to the growth and development of the motion picture art. Official censorship is still young; it is not a hardy plant. In Ohio it has been suspended more than once, and it is now leading the sad existence of a statute which is not indorsed by public sentiment. In our neighboring state of Pennsylvania it has just started, and we have had some decisions which have moved the laughter of the world. The latest display of censorial stupidity was made over the film "John Barleycorn." All who have seen this picture agree that its moral lesson is powerful; indeed, there is a good deal more morality than drama in the production. Naturally enough, the film was enthusiastically approved by temperance societies and all the elements which stand for total abstinence, while on the other hand it excited the resentment of the liquor interests. Enter: J. Louis Breitinger, official censor of the state of Pennsylvania. He says he cannot pass the film because it exaggerates. He is not satisfied with the size of the happy ending; he says he wants the happy ending much longer. This is clearly invading the realm of art rather than of ethics. Just when and where J. Louis Breitinger qualified as a dramatic critic has not been revealed to mortal man.

We knew it would come to this. Clothe a man or, worse still, a woman, with arbitrary power to rule in matters of morality and you cannot set any limits. Censors will go from ethics to matters of taste and finally to rules of dramatic construction. It is agreeable to the friends of the motion picture, and indeed to all Americans who take pride in their liberties, to note the fact that the press of Philadelphia takes a strong stand for the freedom of the screen. One of the papers prints a scene from the films which Breitinger will not allow to be shown. Of course, no attempt will be made to stop the paper from circulating a picture which Breitinger says must not be shown in any moving picture theater in Pennsylvania. Where is the logic of this situation? Why is the newspaper privileged to print unhindered what the exhibitor may not show without running the risk of being cast into jail? Censorship is its own worst enemy. It may be trusted to array public sentiment against itself. The weight of public opinion and the self-respecting exhibitors, which constitute more than 99 per cent. of the exhibiting body, will eventually crush censorship.

"A STRIKING parallel," says a Western paper, "might be drawn between the depiction of crime in moving pictures and stories of crime in newspapers. Most, if not all, the arguments against pictures of crime might be used with equal propriety against newspaper articles giving details of crime, and, on the other hand, the arguments in favor of publication of such matter in newspapers might be applied to the presentation of this class of films." We cite this remark because it has a special significance just now when the newspapers in this city are giving up the lion's share of their front page to two so-called murder mysteries. What would be thought of the motion picture producers if they emulated this horrible example and tried to show scenes in and about the locations of the murders? Happily, no producer even thinks of such a thing. If crime is to be the chief theme of newspapers the pictures will not follow such a policy, which is really destructive of justice and productive of a disgusting morbid feeling in the public.

THE good effects of the recent reorganization of the exhibitors of the country are beginning to be felt even thus early. The newly-elected president of the League has received letters from exhibitors all over the country congratulating him on his election and expressing an anxiety to join and to be active in the organization. While the blight of censorship threatened to disrupt the organization a second time the work of really useful construction had come to a practical standstill. Now, with this danger out of the way and with the League committed unequivocally against all forms of censorship, there promises to be a great revival of interest in organization. The new president will play no politics and is anxious to have the exhibitors all over the country to understand this. He has splendid plans for the creation of a national bureau of assistance which will render an equivalent in service to every exhibitor who pays dues to the national organization. The great body of exhibitors in this country consists of intelligent men, thoroughly in love with their calling and anxious to cooperate for the common good, not only of themselves but of the industry at large. These men will now be given a chance to show what they can do, and the results will surely be beneficial to the growth and the prestige of motion pictures in every state of the Union.

Greater Power Hath No Art

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

NEARLY two years ago an organization was dedicated to the proposition of encouraging good stage plays, "by the people and for the people," and behind it was a belief in what has come to be recognized as "dramatic instinct" in people. This belief is founded on a profound knowledge of human nature. We need to be charmed and stimulated in order to set going the finer energies within us. When we feel that we are being forced to attack difficult problems, such as many presented in the old system of education, there is a revolt within us that clogs the wheels of thought. This leads to no desirable ends. There is lacking a pleasant receptive condition that exists in our minds when we expect to be entertained.

Have you ever noticed how the presence of one brilliant talker in a mixed society seems to depress slow thinkers, either to silence them altogether or arouse their hostility? The swift methods of one are out of tune with the others, out of harmony with the whole, and this is the effect an impatient teacher has upon children with characters yet in the formative period. That is one reason why we used to hate school. When minds are not properly receptive, they are not alert. It is not possible for such minds to absorb thoroughly; so much that is apparently learned is soon forgotten. How about the pretty stories we read, the little rhymes we heard? Drastic means may cultivate mental power to an astonishing extent for purposes of examination, but it is only a flare that leaves darkness more intense after it is over. Those things which get a foothold in us and grow are the things to which we naturally incline or which are so presented as to offer strong attractions to our attention. It is on this account that we so often acquire wrong views instead of actual knowledge.

At a certain advanced stage of mental development hard facts and logical theories alone appeal to the mind, but the great mass of people are not in that stage. They are chiefly occupied with problems of maintenance and reproduction. When not thus occupied they seek relief, recreation or what is agreeable in companionship or public entertainment. They go to the picture shows in receptive mood, ready to laugh or sympathize, with no inherent dislike for what they see, generously disposed because of the low cost, in shape to exercise their highest faculties to advantage if some noble truth is presented in screen story. In what other kind of gathering can be found daily so many people free from bias, open to conviction, ready to absorb whatever is presented to them in convincing form? The man who has splendid ideas to promulgate, who can cover his purpose by subtlety and dramatic skill, has an audience of countless millions waiting for him in the picture shows.

You may talk yourself out of breath in the rostrum, you may harangue all your friends until you lose them, you may drive your family into a state of nervous irritation, if not chronic melancholy, by your assertive preachment, and yet be a well-meaning individual. You want to be helpful, but the little you accomplish for good is outweighed a thousand times by what could be done with the same expenditure of effort where minds are tactfully prepared and put in a receptive condition for the truth to be impressed. Along with active energy, hand in hand with it, goes active resistance. There was once a gentleman, whose nationality I will not reveal, who made so much fuss on a ship that they threw him overboard. He swam pluckily along until he came to an island where a man stood watching him. "What's your government?" shouted the swimmer. Then, before a reply could be made, he added, "I'm agin it." This is an old story, but it illustrates what is in many of us, a revolt against imposed control. We prefer to think things out for ourselves.

Moving pictures are presented under one disadvantage. If you are reading this article and do not agree with it, or do not like it, you can turn over the page and seek what you want elsewhere. You cannot thus escape a dull page in the little theater. You are compelled to give up the evening's performance or sit through what bores or repels you. This, however, is the fault of present methods of production rather than of the art itself. It is repetition, imitation and cheap treatment of screen stories that repel an audience. People do not leave charming treatment of an original story, even if it does not wholly suit their ideas and ideals. Then underlying sincerity counts. When a photoplay is obviously an edited and re-edited series of incidents strung together without definite purpose or honest theme, it wears on an audience more than any other form of release. Considerable ingenuity has been exercised in rearranging dull plays, or in bracing them up by the use of supporting subtitles, and this, together with a few tons of lurid "paper," has proven sufficient to advantageously market the conglomerate things, but such products are makeshifts. They are usually purchased for billboard purposes—they represent about as much real value as side-shows outside the main tent—more bait for the unthinking. Many foreign failures have been thus reconstructed, but they rank with stale imitations and "exblowzhun" dramas. The gradual elimination of such "features" will dispose of the one serious disadvantage under which moving pictures labor.

Evolution in the organic world is now commonly understood, and it is almost as well recognized that evolution takes place in the social world by much the same methods. The constant increase of brain development now going on means a finer individual consciousness and a wider distribution of appreciative intelligence. As we constantly improve as individuals, we lift society to a higher plane. We improve because we want to—not because we have to, so that old, old love of the story, nothing more than deep interest in varied human experience, has grown to what is now denominated as "dramatic instinct." Dramatic instinct is so widely distributed that a very large percentage of the average audience is highly critical and keenly sensitive to the merits and defects of screen portrayals.

The most powerful forces working for social freedom at present are hidden ones. They elude the orator. Literature does not uncover them. There even seems to be a confusion of opinion on the subject of "social freedom" among clear thinkers and men of science. But moving pictures, treating feeling in its relation to function, and reaching out all over the world, have suddenly and silently become a tremendous civilizing factor. The best of them are in themselves a step toward social freedom, if it means the greatest happiness of the greatest number. If moving pictures do no other good in the world than that which they are constantly doing, they possess a greater power than any other art in relieving the tedium of life, in curing the human race of what cannot be otherwise briefly described than as "Chronic Pessimism."

A National Moving Picture Theater

By W. Stephen Bush.

FROM time to time the newspapers of the country start a discussion on the necessity of having a National Theater. Some years ago the movement for the erection and endowment of such a theater had progressed beyond the theoretic stage; plans actually had been prepared and subscriptions had been collected toward the creation of a fund for making a start. It had been intended to build the National theater in the City of Washington. The project ultimately failed. We have now a strong repertory of genuine American plays, racy of the native soil, but we have no National Theater. Nor are we likely to have such a theater in the appreciable future. This is not the place nor is this the time to reopen the discussion as to the propriety of establishing a National Theater.

It does seem to me, however, that the establishment of a national motion picture theater, such as we now actually have in this city, would and does work infinite good to the development of the motion picture art. I have referred to it as the National Theater, not because it is supposed to deal with plays reflecting our own peculiar national views and habits of life. I choose the term national rather because the theater has already become a recognized pattern for the presentation of motion pictures. One cannot go to the Strand Theater without meeting one or more exhibitors from different parts of the country anxious to witness the performances and eager to profit by the advice as well as by the example of the management. We speak so confidently because the great undertaking has passed the experimental stage and has become a permanent institution founded for the most part on the methods of presentation. The feeling is spreading all through the country that the motion picture is entering upon a new era of quality, and that this theater is the alpha and omega of this new era. The reason is obvious enough. The big production, representing the highest effort for the time being, is sure of a worthy presentation and of the heralding which it deserves. One could not think of a better incentive to the producers of quality.

The significance of such a theater, its inestimable value to the industry and its reliability as an unfailing indicator of quality lie in the fact that the theater is free to choose its program from the best the world affords. The moment such a theater lets itself be guided or even influenced by any considerations other than the considerations of quality its usefulness begins to wane immediately, its patronage, both in numbers and in kind, is bound to suffer, and it ceases to be what it should ever strive to be: A beacon light for all the world in search of quality in motion pictures.

A theater devoted solely to motion pictures and filled to overflowing on torrid afternoons and on hot nights deserves to be studied closely. It must profit us all and it must benefit exhibitors in particular to become familiar with the ideas and the methods which insure such rare success. At some time in the near future it may be our pleasant task to detail with a generous allowance of space all the items which go to create this success. We hope in this way to render a real service to all our readers, but at this time we have room only for a brief outline of some of the main features, and even these we must indicate rather than describe.

One of the great characteristics of the improved order of presentation is the creation of an atmosphere which will favorably predispose the audience in its judgment upon the performance on the screen. The old orators were experts in this way of winning an audience right at the start. The creation of such an atmosphere is, of course, the work of a genuinely capable exhibitor. A thousand small things go toward creating such an atmosphere, and they are things mostly that are much easier felt than described. Indeed, they are subtle and elusive. Nor can it be expected that an exhibitor will learn the lesson which the theater in question teaches by just a flying visit. The details are there, but they require careful study and plenty of time. It is worth a day or two to learn the science of pleasing your audience before the performance begins.

Next to the atmosphere the music is one of the determining factors. Much has been written since the early days on the value of music as an adjunct of the motion picture, and we all know there has been considerable improvement in the last five or six years. The illustration of the picture by means of music is an art, which, up to recent days, has never been practiced. The old idea of abruptly changing the music with every passing scene and working effects with the orchestra, as it were, is still prevalent in many theaters. Even such music, of course, is better than no music at all, but it is very far indeed from the best and most artistic manner in which music can be made to aid or rather to illustrate the passing pictures on the screen. Especially the big features with a big story need the best aid that music can give them. Now, the method in vogue at the Strand is to select a "motif" in harmony with the prevailing atmosphere of the play. Transposing and counterpointing this governing "motif" indicates but does by no means define this new method of enlisting music in aid of the motion picture. Here, too, of course, experience must count. It requires days of study and observation to grasp the principle of the thing. Judging from the effects of this kind of music on the audience we must conclude that no other system of employing music can be compared to it. It seems to bring the psychology of the picture closer to us; it seems to illustrate the subtler meanings of the play; it destroys the hideous effect which follows from what is known as "playing the pictures." In features which offer special possibilities in the development of the music it creates an operatic quality which is most pleasingly novel and exceedingly popular. The music, based on one comprehensive and complete "motif," really and truly accompanies the picture, and, as it were, magnifies it. There is no reason in the world why exhibitors everywhere cannot use this system. It will need painstaking selection and elaboration in every instance, but it will always be worth while.

If the growth of the big production is to be assured, if we are to have plays more like "Cabiria" and "Quo Vadis?" etc., we must have houses in which they can be adequately represented. The first question that arises in the mind of the big producer or, rather, the producer of big things, is: "Where can I show these plays in a befitting manner, charging a befitting price?" At present the number of such houses is small, but we are glad to observe from advices all over the country that the number is growing. No doubt the news of the gratifying and extraordinary success of our own standard theater here in the city, our truly national motion picture theater, has reached the ears of enterprising capitalists, and more homes for the really big creations of kinematography are being built everywhere.

"One Wonderful Night"

Essanay's Production of Louis Tracy's Widely Read Novel Filled with Stirring Heart Interest Throughout.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

MANY complaints have been made of the evils of padding by exhibitors, of late, and these complaints have been founded on good and reasonable grounds. In direct antithesis to such padding, "One Wonderful Night," in four parts, will commend itself as an exemplar both for condensation of story and for continuous rapid action. Indeed, so true is this the spectator will find added pleasure in viewing the films a second, a third, and even a fourth time.

When one remembers that the many incidents, the plotting and counter-plotting, the changes wrought in the lives of the principals, and the triumph of good over evil in the face of almost insuperable difficulties all take place within the eight short hours of a single night, condensation and rapid action must of necessity govern the production, in order that the spectator may insensibly join in the winged rush of events. The word "winged" is used advisedly, for, at the close, one unconsciously inhales a deep breath, just as if the pace had been a telling one physically.

Director E. H. Calvert has put forth his finest efforts in the production. He has succeeded in visualizing the story so that it will make a strong appeal to those who have already read it in serial or book form as well as to those who have not. The former will have their interest heightened, because they are furnished the actual scenes amid which the incidents of the story took place and the living action of the characters in person; the latter will be enabled to follow the story at first hand by visualization, connectedly, dramatically.

Exception may be taken to the method employed by Mr. Calvert in the introduction of the characters at the outset. The dialogues accompanying these instructions will have the tendency to confuse the spectator as to the point where the photoplay actually begins. The dividing line is indicated on the film, however, by the subtitle, "Dusk. The beginning of 'One Wonderful Night,'" but many may overlook it, as I did, at the first viewing.

All the stirring scenes of the photoplay have been brought out spiritedly and realistically. The wild chase of Lamotte, one of the three bad men of the story, through the crowded streets of New York, out to Riverside Drive, at a point on which he drives his auto over a frowning embankment, barely escaping death by jumping from the machine before it crosses the edge; the attack on Hunter, the newspaper man, by the ruffians Martiny and Rossi, and the gallant attempt of Curtis to seize them; the knockdown of the Hungarian Count Vassilan by a sledge hammer left by Curtis, who has just married the heroine of the story in the Little Church Around the Corner; the "roughhouse" in the restaurant, in the Hungarian quarter, and the capture of Martiny and Rossi are as real as the actual could make them.

Henry R. Hunter, a newspaper man.....Howard Watrous
Jeane de Courtois, a schemer.....Leo White
Antoine Lamotte, G. Martiny, Ferdinand Rossi, } the conspirators.....Ed Babille, Chas. Hitchcock, M. C. Von Betz
Lawyer Schmidt.....Robert Bolder

The entire cast is to be commended; not only for marked ability in individual work, but for fine "team" work as well.

Scene from "One Wonderful Night" (Essanay).

It is always pleasant to see the members of a dramatic, or photodramatic, company combining as a unit to make the big scene true to life, just as each player does his or her level best in the scenes where he or she holds the stage. It is due as much to the enthusiasm displayed while acting in combination as it is to clever individual acting that "One Wonderful Night" makes a strong appeal, not overlooking, of course, the influence of the fine story of the photodrama.

I am frankly of the opinion that no better choice could have been made by the readers of the Ladies' World for the hero of "One Wonderful Night" than Francis X. Bushman. In the role of John D. Curtis Mr. Bushman is exceedingly happy. In his impersonation Curtis is a clean-cut American gentleman; fearless of consequences when the right is at stake, and gentle as a woman in affairs of the heart. There is never a sign of braggadocio or of the-center-of-the-stage mannerism in Mr. Bushman's characterization. In the scenes which he dominates he makes Curtis create the impression that he is only playing the part of a man and a gentleman, who has never a thought other than to meet in the best and most effective way the difficulties that confront him. In the scene where Curtis arrives at his apartments and discovers the note left by Lady Hermione, charging him with deceit, Mr. Bushman discloses the true gentleness of the character of the hero. There is no explosion of expletives; no burst of passion at being wronged; just a deathlike sickness of the heart, expressed in sorrow-laden eyes, at being so grievously misunderstood. For me the acting in this scene carried greater weight than that in any of the other scenes where the hero seizes the broad eye of the multitude.

Miss Beverly Bayne is charmingly sweet as Lady Hermione, and Miss Lillian Drew in the part of her maid, Marcelle, is pleasing. The two strong characters, the Earl of Valletort and Count Vassilan, are excellently impersonated by Thomas Commerford and Rapley Holmes. There is a suppressed humor in the Count of Mr. Holmes that catches one's risibilities.

Scene from "One Wonderful Night" (Essanay).

E. H. Calvert, in addition to his activities as producing director, has given us a very faithful impersonation of Steingall, chief of detectives. Steingall's assistant, Clancy, is ably represented by Harry Mainhall, who, by the way, is "some shucks" himself as a director. But I came near overlooking Bryant Washburn, whose Howard Devar is presented in Mr. Washburn's customary finished style of acting. Jean de Courtois, the schemer, is cleverly drawn by Leo White, and John H. Cossar and Miss Helen Dunbar make the parts of Mr. and Mrs. Horace P. Curtis stand out prominently. Lamotte, Martiny and Rossi, a trio of cutthroats, live up fully to their reputations in the care of Messrs. Babille, Hitchcock and Von Betz. The lawyer Schmidt of Robert Bolder is a well-drawn character. But the messenger boy, who figured so prominently in the "roughhouse" in the Hungarian restaurant, must not be overlooked. He plays his little part with enthusiasm and will be heard of some day.

"One Wonderful Night" was released Saturday, July 18, through the feature department of the General Film Co.

Standardizing of Film Perforation

Accuracy and Uniformity Lie at the Very Foundation of Motion Picture Projection.

By Frank M. Byam.

A LEADING manufacturer of motion picture projectors recently declared the absence of a universal standard of film perforation to be the chief obstacle in the way of presenting artistic motion pictures. No one familiar with the subject will question the truth of this statement.

Accuracy and uniformity in film perforation lie at the very foundation of motion picture projection. Without these, the maker of film and the manufacturer of motion pictures equally with the builder of projectors and the exhibitor may be—and is—hopelessly handicapped in the effort to reach the screen and the public with pictures of the highest excellence.

Great improvements have been made in film perforation since the days of the earlier investigators. It is now possible to so construct a perforator as to insure the maximum of precision, accuracy and uniformity in its performance. Perforators of various types may differ in principles of design and in character of construction; they may not be equally durable or efficient; but there is no reason why the perforations they make should not be uniform in size and shape or why the various specifications governing the laying out of the perforation gauge should not be uniform.

It is interesting to note some of the theories that have been advanced concerning perforation as they have found expression through machines built to perforate motion picture film. Some of these theories are wholly incompatible with the standardizing of film perforation. And first, as to the perforation of one hole on each side of the film at each down stroke of the punch.

This method of perforating would exclude standardization because it is impossible to perforate a uniform number of holes for each foot of film with a machine making one hole on each side of the film at each down stroke. Perforations of this type depend upon the shuttle to control the film on its travel through the machine, but the tension of the film varies with changes in the physical condition of it, and since the shuttle engages with the perforations on the forward or leading edge only it is incapable of correcting the register of it so as to insure accuracy and uniformity in perforation. The film might be brought to register by means of pilots. But perforators of this type rarely carry pilots having more than two pins—one on each side of the film. Pilots so constructed will not register the film properly for accurate and uniform perforation, for the reason that they do not come in contact with the film by engaging with the perforations at a sufficient number of points, nor are the points of contact distributed over a sufficient area. The best practice in the construction of pilots as an aid to proper placing of film for perforation requires the use of at least four pins on each side of the pilot.

One rather voluminous writer on film subjects commends perforators the gauge of which may be altered at the will of the operator. Naturally, the use of such a perforator would discourage standardization. With every operator enabled to alter the gauge at will there might easily be as many different gauges of perforation as there were perforating machines in service. Fortunately, machines of the types just discussed have not come into general use.

The thing of prime importance in the standardization of film perforation is the perforation gauge. And this brings us to a consideration of the subject of film shrinkage. It is not possible to determine in advance to just what extent shrinkage will take place in a given strip of film under varying conditions. But it is possible to determine in advance the maximum shrikage under average conditions of handling. It is very generally accepted as settled that the maximum shrinkage of motion picture film under average conditions is three thirty-seconds of an inch per foot. And it has been found possible to establish a perforation gauge based upon that shrinkage which provides the precision and accuracy necessary to perfect perforation, while at the same time making due allowance for shrinkage.

The task of building machines to perforate film to a given gauge may well be left to the discretion of the manufacturers. But they should have no option as to the specifications governing the perforation gauge. These should be arbitrarily established and rigidly adhered to. It should be made possible to use film prepared by any perforator in any camera—to pass it through any printing machine without delay or difficulty—and to handle it successfully in any projector. That is to say, there should be set up a definite universal standard of film perforation to which the film movement mechanism of all motion picture machinery should be made to conform.

"The Man on the Box"

Strand Audience Delighted with New Lasky Feature—MacGrath's Story Makes Fine Picture Comedy in Five Parts.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

LOVE is never more sincere than when it laughs. The truest and most wholesome—we do not say greatest or deepest—love story isn't a cry of the soul. Humor is indeed a saving grace. It is always smiling cant, hypocrisy and sentimentality out of the door to keep life healthy. And how it clears any work of art from these deadly things! A photoplaywright with it as an intermediary between himself and his audience can put the boldest things on the screen and get all the effect of dash without leaving in the spectator's way any of that trash the unconvinced imagination has to throw out before it can enjoy the picture.

The new Jesse L. Lasky feature, "The Man on the Box," from Harold MacGrath's novel, is a thoroughly wholesome love story in which laughter buoys up sentiment all the way through and keeps it fresh, convincing and delightful. There was a happy, light-hearted note in the laughter at the Strand Theater, breaking out again and again while the picture was being shown, a note that showed the audience feeling the heart-interest and humor at the same time and thoroughly enjoying itself. It is a love story, but one in which the fates take all direction out of the hands of the characters and plays pranks with them. The man—Lieutenant Bob Warburton—never in the world intended to become coachman of the girl—Betty Annesley—until fate invited it. He had seen her in Europe and had tried to scrape acquaintance with her on the ship. Back in Washington, he finds his sister invited to a grand ball and, for a prank shaves and takes the place of her coachman; but reads his number upside down and, later, gets the wrong ladies. The result is played and produced to be very amusing; for while many of the situations have a rollicking irresponsibility that naturally compels laughter, even in the places where the fun isn't so inherent the players act the irresponsibility and get it over. It is safe to say that in the whole five reels whenever the picture expected a laugh the audience responded and almost always heartily. But it is the sincerity of the love story that makes the humor so contagious. One has to admire the clever means used to work up these two together. The construction of the plot—even though it has one or two scenes (when the Annesleys and Bob are at Monte Carlo) that might be cut out with no loss—shows a good deal of human wisdom.

The prologue is an Indian story and shows Bob doing a thrilling deed of heroism. The emotional content of this is worked up so well that the audience broke in with applause and one could hear ejaculations here and there. Thus at the start we are made deeply interested in the hero of the love story to follow. One would say that it surely needed a touch of Irish blood to make one be like Bob, a fun loving, dependable-irresponsible, likable sort. He is played by Max Figman admirably. Bob wasn't the man to eavesdrop; but this is a comedy, and we are not made sure that it is intentional. Betty Annesley is the daughter of a colonel who is gambling away his soul. For a long while she thinks Bob merely the groom she has hired. She's in love with him, but never admits it to herself. The plot helps her by giving her many reasons to admire him. Yet to keep love, refinement and dignity shining through this particular situation at the same time took art, and Lolita Robertson, who has this role, does it all in a most charming way. The man who has Colonel Annesley in his power, in that lesser side of the picture, its melodrama, is named Karloff, and is played by J. W. Johnston, who gave to the part all it required. He, with his black boar's tusk mustaches and conventional villainy; is a clear-cut and commendable figure. Also one would not need to search for something to say in praise of each and every one of the cast, vivacious and sincere as a whole. The staging, too, is of high merit. Especially good is the fake runaway scene, with Bob on the box, and Betty, whom he thinks his sister, inside; and also the calvary charge upon the Indians in the prologue, which would have been better if the line had not halted for that instant when good tactics sacrificed something of verve. The photography in all the important scenes is of the best. The whole is surely a very good offering to entertain and please.

Gevaert Colored Base Film.

Interesting Description of the Belgian Company's Product Now Being Marketed by the Raw Film Supply Co.

THE Gevaert Company of Belgium is marketing in this country through the Raw Film Supply Company, 15 East Twenty-sixth street, New York City, sole American agents for Gevaert products, a new product which will undoubtedly be of vital interest to the motion picture industry. The stock in question is standard positive emulsion coated on a colored base, which eliminates the necessity of tinting with aniline colors which has been in vogue for several years, and which not only required additional apparatus and labor but had many drawbacks as well. The principal objection, however, to tinting has been the fact that the dye or stain did not take evenly throughout the film, and oftentimes more or less trouble was caused by excessive densitive color on those parts of the film resting on the bottom of the finishing or drying frames.

To eliminate these disagreeable features, the Gevaert Company, after experimenting a number of years, finally succeeded in arranging for the exclusive use of the Silvio Cocanari's patent for a colored base. Editors of the trade journals and large producers throughout Europe unanimously accepted this new product, and it is being used extensively and has practically taken the place of tinting or staining throughout Europe. Colors are absolutely fast to light and are handled identically the same as ordinary stock. At the present time it can be obtained in the following colors, but others are being added to the line, and special tints and shades can be furnished at no extra cost on initial orders of 25,000 feet: Light red and dark red, pale blue and light blue, orange and yellow, light green and verde green, mauve and pale violet, and rose and pink.

The price of this distinctive stock is practically the same as the ordinary, and the Raw Film Supply Company will gladly send samples, etc., to any reader of the Moving Picture World making inquiry for same.

D'ANNUNZIO HAS ANOTHER SICKNESS.

Gabriele D'Annunzio, the author of "Cabiria," now being shown at the Knickerbocker and throughout the country, has had another illness in Paris from which for a time he was not expected to recover. Signor D'Annunzio is only 51 years old.

"Dan"

Hal Reid's Emotional and Stirring Melodrama of War Times Makes Fine "All Star" Picture—Lew Dockstader Plays Dan.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

ONE of the most emotional of war-time melodramas, full of verve and action, and of the heartbreak of war, is "Dan," by Hal Reid. Its hero is a gray-haired darkey slave. At once servant and friend, often familiar in ways that would have been impertinent in one whose heart was not so true, he self-importantly imagines that the care and guardianship of the family, yes, and of the whole South, rests upon his stooping shoulders. There are sincere touches of mixed pathos and comedy in this; for he is often of great service to the family that owns and loves him, and in the end he gives his life to free his young master—he is shot at sunrise by Union soldiers.

Scene from "Dan" (All Star).

The All-Star Feature Film Corporation has filmed this story in five reels, with Lew Dockstader in the titular role, and has made an offering that deserves and will enjoy a good measure of popularity. It has been photographed in some place that passes perfectly for the woods and meadows of Virginia and has a fine old Colonial dwelling in perfect repair fitting finely into the story as the big house of the Dabneys, owners of Dan and staunch supporters of the Southern cause. As will be remembered, there is a double love story in "Dan." As the picture opens, the Hammonds, Northerners, brother and sister, John and Elsie, are visiting the Dabneys. John loves Grace Dabney and Elsie loves Raoul Dabney; yet, when the news of the firing on Sumter comes, there is no bitterness in the leavetaking. The four lovers are lovers still, and in this there is a humanity and bigness of heart that helps the story not a little. At this point Elsie Hammond leaves until the closing scenes; for the action in major part transpires when the two armies are both holding ground not far from the Dabneys' plantation. There are several battle pictures with scenes somewhat unequal in merit, but with some absolutely perfect glimpses, a charge, a corner of a battlefield, etc., that are truly alive and that stir one with their tenseness and abandon. The danger in picturing battles comes when men are lying behind breastworks or are waiting. At such moments it is apt to be too plain that there is no real peril; for at such times the actors look lazy rather than excited. This picture suffers only in one or two places from this defect, and in it the action, seldom permitted to rest, carries over into far more important scenes that again quicken the emotions or tingle in the nerves.

The object of the picture is to give spectators a sense of the thrill of life with its tears and laughter. Its author shows his good sense in getting down to real business right away. We are introduced to Colonel Dabney (Hal Reid) and his darkey servant, Dan (Lew Dockstader); then to Grace (Gail Kane) and Lila, her blind sister (Lois Meredith), who is, with the possible exception of Hal Reid's Colonel Dabney, the most effectively pictured character in the whole cast. Miss Meredith is especially fortunate in emotional moments and adds tremendously to many of the picture's scenes. War is already in the air and "Stonewall" Jackson calls on his neighbor Dabney, to talk it over. This is another excellent character and is played by John H. Pratt. Friends of the Dabneys from the North, the Hammonds (Beatrice Clevenger as Elsie and W. D. Fisher as John) arrive. The scenes of lovemaking use up little space and are made interesting by the humorous interest that Dan takes in the general happiness. It is good, sincere work and does the great comedian credit as a picture player. Raoul Dabney is played by George Cowl with intelligence and ease.

All this is what might be termed the front-door side of the melodrama's situation. We find the story's villain in the white overseer, Jonas Watts (William Conklin), a brutal and evil man, who rules the Dabney's back-door servants, the field hands. The picture had hardly started when it was reported to Colonel Dabney that he was preaching freedom and riches to the negroes. He is anxious for war and turmoil, because he is in love with Grace Dabney and thinks to use the times to pull her down to his level. It is naturally Dan, inconspicuous and despised by Jonas, who saves her from his distressing attentions. Later on, in the picture, Jonas is to be a sergeant of the Union army and is to attempt to capture Grace under cloak of thinking her a Southern Spy, and is too frustrated by John, a Union officer, who is stealing a visit to his sweetheart between battles.

The climax of the picture, as we have noted, is the heroic death of Dan. And the action works up to this point through many not closely knit incidents, but all of them logical enough and all adding in some measure, as was necessary, to our appreciation of his deed. It is no censure of the subject to say that with less material in use the picture might have been more concrete and so set this off even more effectively. For our hands are so full after watching the adventures of Dan's betters that we feel we let slip some of the emotional content of this most noble deed of all when it comes. Just as the story stands it is effective and emotional. The photography is clear and effective. We feel very sure that where the offering is shown to any kind of responsive audience the house will be filled with applause and laughter. It is a picture that surely ought to be shown with patriotic music and good sound effects; for where it is properly put on the screen it is sure to be a strong winner.

CHINESE HUMOR SEEMS THE REAL THING.

The "Universal Boy" (Matty Roubert) had one of the strangest experiences of his young but adventuresome career the other day when the Honorable Yon Yang Ying, Chinese Consul General, visited him at the Universal's Imp studio for the purpose of posing before the camera in a scene with the little fellow in his latest series entitled "Matty Solves a Chinese Kidnapping Mystery." When the Universal Boy asked Mr. Ying how he liked being a moving picture actor, he replied with an Oriental twinkle: "Oh, it's all right being an actor, but I wouldn't like to be a cameraman; his life must be one continual 'grind.'"

KLEINE'S "SPARTACUS" TO OPEN BIG NEW HOUSE

The Ivanhoe Theater, now nearing completion at Sandusky, Ohio, and expected to be ready to inaugurate its season about September 15, is one of the finest picture theaters in America. Manager Blatz has spared no expense. He will pursue a policy of running only the best of features, opening with George Kleine's eight-part spectacle "Spartacus; or, The Revolt of the Gladiators," which recently completed a highly successful run at the Auditorium, Chicago.

SINCERELY patriotic and vitalized by a splendid list of capable interpreters, "The Birth of the Star Spangled Banner" is worth while on its own account, and it is bound to make a hit at this moment. Whenever the old fighting spirit of our men, particularly those of Colonial and Revolutionary ancestry, is stirred by the prospect of war, there slumbers a volcano of enthusiasm in the hearts of Americans. No other nation has passed through such a constant succession of warfare during the Nineteenth Century as our own. None has put such vast armies into the field. During the Rebellion there were more troops in the Northern Army than Germany ever used, and the field of operations extended over a line that would reach from London to the Cataracts of the Nile. That war, between brother and brother, saw the fiercest engagements ever waged by armed forces, and the sons of those brothers, now united under Old Glory, are ready to defend it at any cost.

All is seemingly quiet from Atlantic to Pacific in our land. From shore to shore reigns a surface peace, but the forces below are only slumbering, and it would take very little to fan them into fierce flame. The rebellious elements of Europe are mixed in with the conquering determination of early Americans, and the national spirit is intense though undemonstrative on most occasions. It bursts out occasionally at a mere flash of the national emblem, spontaneous and impassioned, and this photodrama, depicting incidents leading to the birth of the flag, is sure to call forth more than one enthusiastic demonstration.

We have come out of the storm and anguish of our wars a better and a stronger people, but the elements of caution and protection have not been eliminated from our natures. There is still a haunting sense of peril for those who are near and dear to us, quickly aroused by menace on border or coast. Our men are as ready as ever to fight for their ideals, and there is embodied in the Star Spangled Banner recognition of a unity of purpose and a unity of heart, sometimes forgotten in our eagerness to "get on" with our business and social duties. The Edison two-reel photodrama is well calculated to call forth a spirit that should send us to the relief of the ignorant, unhappy and incapable people on our southern border, that of conquest for world-betterment.

There is a serious attempt made to render the presentation of "The Birth of the Star Spangled Banner" historically accurate—that is, to follow carefully whatever accounts are dependable of events at that time, and this constitutes an additional value, especially for those not familiar with the story of our country's birth. This attempt is manifest in attention to detail and in depicting what led up to the inspiration of Frances Scott Key. The actors are no longer struggling to get into the center zone of camera immortality, but are imbued with a sense of responsibility, each to portray his allotted characterization. And there is no overacting. Measured up by purely artistic conventions, irrespective of the effect of our national emblem, the entire production is entitled to the success it is bound to achieve.

HUNTER BENNETT IN WEST.

Hunter Bennett, assistant general manager of the World Film Corporation, who is making a transcontinental trip embracing the twenty-two branch offices of his company, arrived in Kansas City from St. Louis last Wednesday. In St. Louis W. P. Cuff was appointed manager to succeed Fred Murphie, R. L. White, formerly special representative of the Mutual, was appointed manager of the Kansas City office, to succeed J. Erwin Dodson. R. S. Shrader, manager of the Universal Film Exchange, Louisville, was appointed manager of the Indianapolis office for the World Film.

Mr. Bennett's trip is for reorganization, to take care of the immense plans outlined by General Manager Lewis J. Selznick. He states that in the future policy in releasing the Feature productions of Messrs. Shubert, William A. Brady, Owen Davis, Charles Blaney and Cecil Spooner plays and spectacles the success of the World Film Corporation is an assured fact. "America," the New York Hippodrome spectacle; "The Whip," the Drury Lane success; "The Gentleman from Mississippi," "Across the Pacific" and "The Lure" have already been produced. Some future releases are "Way Down East," "Bought and Paid For," "In Old Kentucky," "Baby Mine," "The Blue Mouse," "The Witching Hour," "The Fortune Hunter," etc.

Mr. Bennett is making a thorough study of conditions in each section, conferring with exhibitors and exchange men, and, needless to state, on his return to New York City will be one of the best authorities on the feature film situation in the United States.

VITAGRAPH TO PRODUCE "HAMLET."

The cast for the Vitagraph Company's magnificent production of Shakespeare's immortal tragedy, "Hamlet," has been selected, and Director James Young is now busily engaged with rehearsals of what is expected to be the most pretentious film story of a classic ever photographed. L. Rogers Lytton will be seen as Claudius, Lionel Belmore as King Hamlet, James Young as Prince Hamlet, Julia Swayne Gordon as Queen Gertrude, Charles Kent as Polonius, Arthur Cozing as Laertes and Clara Kimball Young as Ophelia. Every attention is being paid to detail so as to insure historical accuracy in scenic embellishment, costuming and effects.

"The Masked Motive"

Five-Reel Eclectic Offering Tells Good Story Full of Suspense—Worthy Offering of Scope and Interest.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THERE is a marked scope and breadth of interest in the newest Eclectic offering, which was made in France and gives a big ,emotionally effective story of French life. It deals with one of the great and universally popular themes, a mother's love for her baby. At its climax we find two mothers with one baby between them and each thinking it is hers. These women are dear friends, although of entirely different stations in life. The child of the rich countess, a widow, has died; but her doctor for his own selfish purposes has kept the secret from her and has brought the child of the poor woman to her as her own. He is the head of a French state foundling asylum; he loves the rich widow, who has been very sick, and a few weeks before he had advised her to send her baby to the country where it would get perfect care. But he found, after making a promise to bring it back to her, that it was dead. The poor woman had also been sick and her doctor had advised her against nursing her baby. She tried to get a wet-nurse, but her drinking husband had spent all her money and she was compelled to take it to the state foundling asylum from which the doctor managed to steal it. While the rich woman was sick the poor one tried to get to her to ask aid so that she could keep her baby, but the porter wouldn't let her in. Now, in her trouble, she comes to get comfort, for she has found that her baby has been stolen. The rich friend puts the baby into her arms. The poor woman looks at it and joyously claims it as hers. The evil doctor is present, pronounces her crazy and has her taken to a private asylum for the insane. The suspense becomes marked to a degree at this point, though it has held the spectator's attention all the way through. Of course, in the end, the doctor is discredited and the right mother gets her own child. The rich woman gets her girlhood sweetheart back and the poor woman's husband reforms. And all this is done in a most pleasing and heart-satisfying way.

Scene from "The Masked Motive" (Eclectic).

This is merely the core of the story, its primary heart-interest. One of the first things noticeable about the offering is its scope, and by this we refer not only to the number of radically different experiences that its author makes his characters pass through, the distinct human sorrows and human joys, but to the extent of the picture's backgrounds. We have, for instance, the rich home of the countess contrasting with the home of the workman and his wife. Then we are shown the kind of temptations that assail the count and those that confront the laborer. Then we have a picture of that very interesting institution, the state foundling asylum, and one of the private insane asylum. There are city and country scenes and a few glimpses of what represents Africa. There's a persuading touch of liveliness about them all that stands for realism and is most entertaining.

The story opens by showing that the secretary of the rich girl's father is so deeply in love with her that when she marries the count he goes away to Africa. The poor girl is seamstress to the rich girl. She marries a workingman and both marriages are at the same church on the same day. One party arrives as the other is leaving and both wedding parties meet again at the public park. This seems to be a delightful and truthful glimpse of Parisian life. It is fresh, convincing and entertaining. The acting, especially of the workingman's wife, is natural, strong and sincere. The work of this actress makes strong those scenes wherein her workingman husband and his best friend (two finely portrayed characters) are troubling her by their growing fondness for the wine shops, and especially it makes those emotional scenes when she finds her money to pay the wet-nurse gone and that scene outside of the foundling asylum deeply affecting. The big scenes in the last act give her full play, and she makes them tell powerfully. The countess is by contrast weak, but plays intelligently and does well enough. The doctor, in a rather conventional villain's part, holds up his end, and there are many excellently-drawn characters in the lesser figures of the picture. The staging and photography are worthy, and the whole makes a much stronger and more pleasing effect on the spectator than the usual offering. We dare commend it as a strong picture and, as an offering, a very safe guess from the exhibitor's viewpoint.

Goodwin Company Files New Suits

Declares It Is Anxious to Preserve Its Rights During the Life of Its Patent.

THE Goodwin Film & Camera Company commenced an action in the United States District Court last Mon- against Lumiere Jougla Company, Celluloses Planchon, Inc., and Claudius Joulailon to compel the defendants to respect the rights embodied in the patents granted to the late Rev. Hannibal Goodwin, which are controlled by the plaintiff.

The bill recites that prior to May 2, 1887, the Rev. Mr. Goodwin invented original photographic pellicles and devised a process for producing the same which revolutionized the art of photography and led to the remarkable development of the motion-picture industry. His inventions were embodied in patents which were duly taken out and subsequently assigned to the company, it is alleged.

For many years the validity of the patents have been the subject of litigation, principally in the thirteen years' suit in which the Eastman Kodak Company was the defendant, the papers recite. Pending the determination of this suit infringement actions against other competitors were not pressed, but with the termination of that suit in favor of the plaintiff's rights the Goodwin company avers it is anxious to preserve its rights during the life of the patent.

It is alleged that since the decision of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals sustaining the validity of the Goodwin patents was issued the defendants have continued to infringe on the rights of the plaintiff, although repeatedly warned not to do so. Moreover, it is claimed that the action of the defendants has been taken despite the fact that such film concerns as Pathes Freres, the Raw Film Supply Company and the Celluloid Company have recognized the plaintiff's rights and have compromised damage claims and arranged to pay a royalty to the plaintiff during the life of the Goodwin patents.

The plaintiff charges that as a result of the alleged infringement it is being deprived of material profits and benefits which would otherwise accrue to the company under the Goodwin patents and asks that the defendants be enjoined from continuing the acts complained of and directed to make an accounting of all profits.

KLEINE ATTRACTIONS BOOMING.

The intermingled atmosphere of business and aura of congeniality that pervades the New York Headquarters of the George Kleine Attractions, Candler Theater Building, 226 West Forty-second Street, not only spells a hearty welcome to exhibitors but makes it a sincere pleasure to carry on negotiations in a place where the atmosphere of gentility is at all times so manifest. The result is the New York headquarters of the Kleine Attractions is consistently making rentals, and if anything is exceeding its profits of the spring season.

To the energy, perseverence and affability of William E. Raynor, general eastern representative, and Frederick L. Ferguson, New York branch manager, are principally due this marvelous condition. Sticktoitiveness has been the motto of this happy combination of amusement men. And it has been a successful one. Raynor and Ferguson are mapping out an aggressive and progressive campaign for the fall and winter season that bids fair to make the financial returns of the New York headquarters of the George Kleine Attractions enormous.

"The Spotted Panther"

Humorous Banter is the Peculiarity that Distinguishes the Newest Leading Players' Picture, in Five Parts.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THERE are two ways of burlesquing anything. One way is to stand boldly at one side and give a wide, open-mouth laugh at it; and this is the way the gallery likes its burlesque. The other way is to prick it with that keen rapier, irony, the while one pretends to be its friend. This way calls for a far more intellectual kind of humor and is liked by people of broader and keener-edged interests. "The Spotted Panther" is a melodrama of India, beautifully staged, and its producer has forced even these perfectly contrived backgrounds that pass for India, and yet are not India, to run a needle-point into a certain kind of home-made exotic picture that he wants to banter. He is a highbrow, and it's plain even in his subtitles; for he names his heroine Sita, showing acquaintance with the Ramayana. One will also find other classic allusions in his names and terms, and he has taken the more subtle method of treatment. With the right audience it will be a roar of laughter; but many of his rapier pricks are so subtly administered that simple minds might miss his points; so he has provided, as a keynote to the main story, a prologue in which he has handled his action in a more broadly humorous way that will set even simple minds laughing with the object of getting them started. Probably this will be sufficient to make the whole go well with the general spectator who, having the keynote, will follow with understanding and enjoyment the whole of the production.

The action opens at Calais, in France, where we find Captain Corcoran, whose ancestors have always "cut their way through life," starting out with his servant and pet panther to get the wonderful manuscript of the Gouroularamtah for the great explorer, Escartefigue. We get a glimpse of him on some sort of a boat, and then he is in India. His worst enemies are the English; but he manages to reach the throne-room of Maharaja Holgar, where that potentate is enjoying himself in the company of his court and the lovely Sita. At first he is to be boiled in oil; but in the next scene he is the Rajah's good friend and is soon to be the protector of Sita from the English. There is a "sensational" burning of the city, a capture and a rescue, and all the romantic properties of the kind of picture satirized.

One of the best points made is the use of the panther with spots—it's a leopard. This beast has no real part in the story; but it licks the princess' toes and in another scene scares the English colonel away from his picnic luncheon, oranges, wines, etc., under the trees—a nooning in the middle of the attack on the pagoda where the hero has taken refuge with Sita. Another point is the use of a man with a modern rifle—this repeater is fairly rubbed in. And another comical point is the imprisoning of the English colonel in a basket in his tent and in the middle of his camp. It is, as a whole, a very clever piece of work, and picture fans will, we feel sure, take keen delight in it. Photographically it is perfect.

Mr. Hite Shows Underwater Pictures

President of Thanhouser Company Has Received Commendation from Smithsonian Institution.

RESIDENTS of New Rochelle were accorded the first public exhibition Thursday of the under water pictures taken by the expedition to the Bahamas in April, recently shown to the Smithsonian Institution and the National Press Club at Washington. More than three hundred prominent people of Westchester County responded to the invitation extended to them by Charles J. Hite, president of the Thanhouser Company, and the man who financed the Williamson tube and brought this wonderful invention into practical use for science. The pictures were shown at the North Avenue Theater, in New Rochelle, the thrilling under water scenes—man battling with sharks, and sharks battling among themselves—bringing rounds of applause from those privileged to be present at this first public exhibition. These pictures will be first shown at the Broadway Rose Gardens.

Mr. Hite has received recognition from the Smithsonian Institution and the commendation of its scientific members for the expedition he sent to the Bahamas, which obtained the only motion pictures extant of life under the sea. Mr. Hite took the pictures to Washington and offered to the Smithsonian Institution the first view of them. The result was that many of the scientists went also to the National Press Club, where Mr. Hite, accompanied by J. E. and George Williamson, and Carl Gregory, expert cameraman, explained to the Washington correspondents the dangers of robbing the sea of its long held secrets.

Mr. Hite, in commenting on the expedition to the Smithsonian scientists, said: "Except from the lips of divers, who have descended to the shallow depth of 100 feet, the world has lived in total ignorance of the life beneath the sea. Science has evolved little thus far beyond telling soil and sounding the depths.

"No man, until the Williamson invention was made practicable, could tell of the life below. The new invention brings to science the sea's actualities of life, the long lost ships, the Imperators of other days, the hidden reefs, the variegated corals, the moving things. It has spelled success, and proved a real step in scientific progress." A complete log of the expedition is to be presented to the Smithsonian Institution to remain in its archives.

PICTURE PLAYHOUSE FILM EXPANDING.

The Picture Playhouse Film Company has just absorbed the business of the National Feature Film Company at 1126 Vine street, Philadelphia, and has retained Simon Libros, the president and manager of the former company, as manager of the Philadelphia exchange. Mr. Libros has been doing a big business with the Philadelphia and Pennsylvania exhibitors, and will now be in a position to give them much better service than formerly, as the new company has already for release six new plays secured from different American and European producers, and will continue to release each week one or more of the best of the market here and abroad. Several American companies have made arrangements for supplying the new company with features, and it has contracts for foreign features already signed.

As fast as the management can handle the business arrangements it will open offices in all the principal cities, including Canada, where the company is now completing arrangements for its exchange in Montreal. Its New York offices are located at No. 110 West Fortieth street, and it has commenced booking its plays with the New York exhibitors.

BLACHE MAKING "EDWIN DROOD."

Charles Dickens' latest novel, "The Mystery of Edwin Drood," which was never completed owing to the author's death, is being produced in motion pictures by the Blache studios. The well-known English actor, Tom Terriss, has dramatized the novel for picture presentation and completed the famous story in the manner that he thinks Dickens intended. He will play the part of John Jasper, made famous as a stage character by Sir H. Beerbohm Tree in His Majesty's Theater, London, and will collaborate with Herbert Blache in the staging of the photodrama.

Messrs. Blache and Terriss recently completed an elaborate multiple reel production of "The Chimes" by Dickens, in which a number of the Tom Terriss Dickens Associate Players appeared. Mr. Terriss has made a life study of Dickens' works, and his version of what actually happened to the much discussed Edwin Drood and the guilt or innocence of the man accused of his murder promises to be of unusual interest.

IT is a serious undertaking to produce a three-reel comedy, even with such a splendid cast as that of "Uncle Bill." So largely is its success a question of interpretation that the actors in this case virtually create out of their personality what holds interest. That personality is very marked in nearly every one of the performers—each is an artist in his or her way—but Billy Quirk easily carries off the honors. He is a born comedian of the screen, and his long training in brilliant company makes him a veritable star whenever he is given comedy opportunity. Very largely to his work is due the element of fun in "Uncle Bill"—it is a hodge-podge of old stage devices—and only when he was in evidence did the Vitagraph Theater audience laugh.

Rarely do I see a play where I can judge of its effect on an audience. The reviewer is obliged to prejudge—and from the audience point of view, "Uncle Bill" gets over after a long struggle to that end. The serious portion, essential as it is to the complicated plot, is given undue attention for a farce. On the verge of election, a gubernatorial candidate is obliged to see the "Boss" in quest of campaign funds, and there is a general state of uncertainty about results because his wife and his father become mixed up in the antics of Mr. and Mrs. Trent, Billy Quirk and Anita Stewart. Uncle Bill, a convenient millionaire, is expected, but he turns up prematurely and is obliged by force of circumstances to shift his identity.

This gives the inevitable burglar, opportunely engaged in robbing the house, a chance to assume the role of "Uncle Bill," with a string of ensuing complications that are better suited to stage than to screen presentation. From amid the mass of scattered forces, however, gradually emerge the comical Billy and charming Anita. Their marital infelicities, misplaced jealousies and flirtatious tendencies prove the saving clause. Billy and Anita put life and spirit into the play, with a result that the audience begins to laugh and is thoroughly satisfied at the end.

KLEINE MAKING ONLY BIG SUBJECTS IN AMERICA

The announcement that George Kleine had begun the manufacture of pictures in America in addition to importing from Europe has resulted in hundreds of scenarios being submitted to Mr. Kleine's Chicago offices. For the benefit of free-lance photoplaywrights it may be said that Mr. Kleine, for the present at least, will manufacture in this country film subjects adapted from well-known legitimate productions only. The first of these will be "Officer 666" and "Stop Thief," both universally popular melodramatic farces, splendidly fitted for production in motion picture form.

"In Temptation's Toils"

A Two-Part Kleine-Celio Subject, Passing Fair in Quality, with the "Triangle" as the Basis.

AMONG the recent General Film releases appeared a two-part Kliene-Celio subject, entitled "In Temptation's Toils," that, while it was based upon the eternal "triangle"—two women and a man this time—the story possessed a dainty bit of heart interest and was clearly and logically told in the picture. The cast of characters is not at hand beyond the information that Francesca Bertini plays the leading woman's part of Helen Turner, the wife of George Turner. Mlle. Bertini is one of the leading photoplayers now contributing to the Celio productions, and is an actress of unusual attainments. There is no great opportunity for her to display her ability in this subject, but she does perform her part with womanly grace, and, though one is not wholly in sympathy with her at times, she finally proves that a woman's instincts are, at bottom, good.

The picture opens with Dick Turner visiting his brother, George. George's wife, Helen, is a very beautiful woman, and the two fall in love almost at sight. While Helen is very strongly drawn to her husband's brother, she realizes the impossibility of the situation and begs Dick to go away. He does so, but takes with him a rose Helen has dropped to treasure as a remembrance of his love. Not long afterward he marries another woman and a lapse of time shows him nicely ensconced in the bosom of his family with a bright boy of an interesting age.

Then comes word of the death of his brother George while on a hunting trip, and Helen comes to live with Dick's family. Helen attempts to renew the spark of love in Dick's heart and he yields momentarily to her advances, but the little boy happens along at a critical moment and he is reminded that his family's honor is at stake and firmly rejects Helen's suggestion that a divorce be secured so that he may marry her.

Her love scorned, Helen reminds Dick that love often turns to hate, and she leaves him, threatening to bring disgrace upon the family name which they hold in common. The succeeding scenes show Helen leading a rather hilarious life among the cafes, where she meets a famous lion-tamer. The suggestion comes to her that through the performer she may be able to bring Dick to regret his decision, so she plans to appear in public as the lion-tamer's assistant.

Word of this gets to Dick through the daily papers. He is broken in health and rapidly nearing his end. The news of Helen's determination shocks him, but he makes a final appeal to her to save the family name from disgrace. He writes her a letter, inclosing with it the rose which he has treasured all the years, and sends it to Helen through his little son. It is handed to her just as she is preparing to appear with the lion-tamer. The recollection of her love for Dick is awakened, and the appeal of the dying man is sufficient.

Later, as Dick is on his death-bed, Helen is sent for, and there is forgiveness all 'round. There are a number of very beautiful scenic effects in this subject.

"The Opera Singer's Triumph"

Destruction of Big Hotel by Earthquake and Fire Gives Thrilling Rescue Scene in Itala Offering.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

A WELL rounded melodramatic story with a sensational rescue of the heroine from a big hotel wrecked by an earthquake and set on fire, makes the newest Itala offering, in three reels, noteworthy. These earthquake scenes are astonishingly well produced and carry an unmistakable thrill. One rather expects such things, made usually in a studio, to be more or less baldly artificial. Even the best of them seem to the experienced eye somewhat contrived. But in this picture these scenes compare very favorably with another Itala offering of last year, "The Palace of Flame." Yet it is only in their realism that these two pictures compare. In the first, the rescuer had to combat the fierce flames; in this, although there is flame, his chief peril comes from the precarious condition of the great building whose walls have been terribly shattered by the 'quake. The tottering walls, the twisted balcony railings and broken beams, all lit by the ruddy glow of flames, are the background of the brave deed. There was danger to the actor, whether his work was done in a studio or in a truly ruined house, and he was not able to accomplish his "act" without great muscular effort and courageous belief in his ability to land right when swinging over a dangerous place on a rope made of bedclothing torn into strips. The rescued opera singer kept perfectly her seeming lifelessness even while being lowered through a tangle of beams and falling walls. She, too, shows grit. When she is safe the hero falls, and it was not wholly acting; for he comes down fast and sudden on scattered bricks. If it was acting, then the bystanders, too, acted well a very natural concern.

There is only a light villain in the story. He is a rich man who in the opening scenes loved the girl a little, but wanted to delay the engagement when he found that she had no dowry. She becomes a famous opera singer; meets a composer whom she helps to fame, and falls in love with him. He it is who saves her when the hotel is wrecked and the two come home together. In the meanwhile the girl's father has again become rich. The former lover hears her sing and his love is rekindled. He calls on her and wants her to forgive him. She tells him that she never was his enemy. He is pleased to hear it; but the composer comes into the room and she then introduces him as her fiance.

The acting is good, as is the staging and photography. The offering is one that will be quite acceptable.

REARDON AUTHOR OF "IN WOLF'S CLOTHING."

The Moving Picture World's reviewer of films was in error in giving credit to W. E. Wing for the recent Kalem picture, "In Wolf's Clothing." The author of this lively, effective and entertaining offering is Mark S. Reardon.

Miller's theater, Los Angeles, was filled with men from the railroads of all grades to see J. P. McGowan's "The Express Messenger," in which their favorite, Helen Holmes, was featured. This stirring Kalem play was made there, and a number of railroad men can be seen in it. Both McGowan and Miss Holmes are really interested in the railroads and make a specialty of this class of story, so that they are well known all along the coast and are popular with railroad men.

Will E. Sheerer

ONE of the oldest and best liked actors of the Eclair stock company is Will E. Sheerer, character man, famous for his many roles. Mr. Sheerer has had a ripe experience in the field of theatrical work, and before his entrance into pictures was known both in this country and abroad as a "good actor." During the twenty-three years which he has been back of the footlights, he has missed but two seasons. During the Spanish - American War, he fought the enemy in Cuba. On one other occasion he fell for the lure of Wall Street. As a stock and bond salesman his native shrewdness brought him rapidly to the front, but the call of the stage was too strong. From the beginning of his theatrical career, Mr. Sheerer has played character parts and is acknowledged to be a past master in make-up. He is known to have performed the remarkable feat of appearing in three different characters in a well-known play, and for years delighted vaudeville audiences with a protean act, during the course of which he impersonated ten different people. Four years ago he secured an engagement with the Edison company, and after a brief experience at that plant appeared in Vitagraph films. Following this he played character leads for Bison, Nestor, Reliance and Crystal, and from the latter company was taken over by Eclair. Thus far Sheerer has appeared in 150 Eclair releases, and his remarkable mastery of make-up combined with true ability to act has made him one of the most popular players of the company. Two months ago this versatile artist was sent to the Western studios of the Eclair company at Tucson, Arizona, where he expects to remain, and we can look for him to repeat his character success in western productions.

STANDARD GETS EXPOSITION CONCESSION.

The Standard Film Corporation received this week the following telegram from its San Francisco representatives:

"Have closed contract on behalf of Standard Film Corporation for the exclusive motion picture concession of the Panama-Pacific Exposition, including theater, studio, commercial, topical, serial story and official kinematograph privileges in the face of the strongest competition. Have already started work. Really remarkable contract. Unlimited possibilities."

The company announces that its men are already on the ground taking pictures of the work. The contract is regarded as important.

The Standard Film Corporation will have the world's booking rights on all pictures taken in the Exposition grounds, as the contract especially provides for the exclusive taking of pictures by the Standard Film Corporation in the fullest sense of the term.

MARY PICKFORD ANNOUNCEMENT MISLEADING.

A recent advertisement of a film-producing company, in announcing that Mary Pickford films made two or three years ago are to be reissued, led to the belief on the part of many that Mary Pickford was now in the service of that company, and suggested by the subtle use of the word "henceforth" that her future productions were to appear only on the program in question. No verification is required of the fact that Mary Pickford is at present under contract with the Famous Players' Film Company, in whose productions she appears exclusively. For the sake of exhibitors who are not fully acquainted with the situation, it is explained that any other company releasing Pickford films are merely reissuing old productions in which this star appeared, and any other inference from the current announcements of other companies is unjust, both to Miss Pickford and the Famous Players' Film Company.

A Growing Type

Pen Picture of Samuel F. Wheeler, President of Pennsylvania's Organized Exhibitors—His Policies Are Aggressive but Constructive—A Great Convention to Be Called Soon.

By W. Stephen Bush.

THE intelligent and progressive exhibitor of whom it is written that he shall possess more power in the industry is not a mere fiction. You may have thought of him as a creature of editorial optimism, a sort of lay figure to whom the writer of paragraphs addressed his profound wisdom. Let me assure you now that the I. A. P. E. is a veritable concrete, malleable fact. I have just had a most inspiring and refreshing talk with a full grown and well developed specimen of the I. A. P. E. I do not mean to say he was a rare specimen, but I do mean to say he was a very fine specimen, and in telling of him I know that I am describing not only an individual, but a type of exhibitor whose activities are rich in promise for a further and wider uplift of the motion picture.

Samuel F. Wheeler, the president of the organized exhibitors of the Keystone State, is a natural leader of men. As I sat beside him in the Manufacturers' Club in Philadelphia, talking of our common idol, the motion picture, I was impressed with his easy grasp of difficult problems and his direct logical thinking. Mr. Wheeler in manners and appearance suggests a successful practitioner at the bar, and this is exactly what he is. He has practiced law in the city of Philadelphia for about fourteen years, and I think he must have begun at twenty-one, because under the law he could not have begun sooner. He has a pair of keen blue eyes, pleasing regular features and the mobile mouth of an able and trained public speaker. All through our talk I gathered an impression of great latent nervous energy.

Samuel F. Wheeler.

I asked Mr. Wheeler how he became an exhibitor of motion pictures.

"An odd enough story," he replied, with a reminiscent smile. "About five years ago some clients of mine consulted me as to the best way of getting out of a contract for the purchase of a small moving picture theater. I told them I would take over the contract myself, and thus entered the ranks of exhibitors with an investment of about $125."

Mr. Wheeler to-day is the owner of three theaters—the Belmont, with a seating capacity of 1,325; the Fifty-second Street Theater, seating 1,000, and the Apollo Theater, seating 1,400. All these theaters are prosperous, and their owner acts as the general manager, thinking no detail too trifling for his personal attention. About two years ago Mr. Wheeler decided to join the local organization in Philadelphia. The Philadelphia organization has had its ups-and-downs, mostly downs, and when Wheeler joined it there was a small membership and a very scant capital of enthusiasm. The exhibitors were at the mercy of every politician. While they were banded together in a nominal union, they were unconscious of their real strength and power.

After Wheeler entered the organization the members often turned to him for advice and he set an example which they found it profitable to imitate. About a year ago the fire marshal of Philadelphia sent notice to the exhibitors that they must display upon the screens of their theaters a slide which displayed the words "Fire Notice" in large red letters. The notice sounded like a third alarm, and was altogether apt to provoke a panic. The exhibitors were greatly worried. A special meeting was called, and Wheeler went upon the platform declaring that he had absolutely declined to comply with the Fire Marshal's demand. He strongly advised his brother exhibitors to do the same. He explained to them that there was on legal force behind the Fire Marshal's order, and that he proposed to call upon the Director of Public Safety and the Fire Marshal to tell them openly how he was posed to ignore the order. He was as good as his word, and accompanied by a committee of exhibitors, he practically told the officials to mind their own business. The officials, who up to that time had found exhibitors meek and submissive to the point of servility, were struck dumb by the spectacle of an exhibitor insisting upon his legal rights. They blustered and threatened, but the calm and positive attitude of Wheeler had put courage into the hearts of his fellow-exhibitors.

"The panicky slide was never shown and is by this time entirely forgotten. Now the local and state authorities consult with Wheeler before taking any action affecting motion picture theaters, and they find it a very convenient arrangement. Mr. Wheeler has been appointed a member of the Motion Picture Standards Commission, which is a branch of the Department of Labor and Industry. The appointment came from the commissioner directly. It was natural now to see the exhibitors elect Wheeler their president. In spite of many adverse circumstances there was an increase in the membership of the Philadelphia local, a business manager was appointed, and permanent headquarters were opened at 1327 Vine street, in the very heart of Philadelphia film district. At a convention of the exhibitors of the state, held last May in the city of Wilkes-Barre, Mr. Wheeler was elected president of the state organization.

"There are three things for which I want to enlist the aid of every exhibitor in the State of Pennsylvania," said Mr. Wheeler. "First, and above all things, we want to knock out the present censorship law. I believe that the courts will declare the act unconstitutional, but irrespective of the decision of the court, we want to go to the Legislature and work for the repeal of this law. This law has come to us, not in response to a public demand, but rather as a defiance of public sentiment. The papers in this city are against the law, one of them openly advocating its repeal. The idea of one man and one woman regulating the amusements of eight million people is ridiculous. We want to be ready for an active campaign in the fall, when a new Legislature will be elected. We want to pledge every candidate to vote for a repeal. I asked the Moving Picture World to urge an organization of this state by counties, every county should have its local. I am going to arrange for a big and representative state convention to be held within the next thirty days or so in a centrally located city of the state. Governor Tener, Senator Boise Penrose and Mr. Brumbaugh will be there to address the exhibitors. I believe that they will help us.

"Ever since the organized exhibitors in the state and in the nation have declared against censorship of all kinds, all factionalism in this state has come to an end. The Western contingent of exhibitors, who used to hold aloof from us entirely, have assured me of their support in forming as big and as representative a state organization as possible. Indeed, I received assurance of support from every part of the state, and I have every reason to believe that this convention which I propose to call will be the biggest ever held in Pennsylvania. We will also take a decided stand on the question of a liberal Sunday. In this respect Pennsylvania has been rather backward, but we will tackle the question without fear. If the law will not allow us to show vaudeville, we want to have the law forbid the showing of moving pictures in regular theaters. Besides these three big questions, other problems of exhibitors will be considered, and I have no doubt that some good results will follow."

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

Moving Pictures Will Guide in Vocational Selection.

MODERN methods of education are paying heed to the important fact that while some young men are guided by instinct and natural aptitude to their proper vocations, by far the largest number cannot rely on themselves to select the lifework that will suit them best and serve their communities in the fullest measure.

Moving pictures are also being used to aid young men in determining their trade or calling. When early educational advantages have been lacking, it is found still more difficult to make a wise choice. In such cases the popularity of moving pictures will serve to furnish important information.

This new movement in industrial education has been made by the Bureau of Commercial Economics, with offices in Chicago. This bureau is an association of the leading institutions, manufacturers, producers and transportation lines in this country and abroad, and its work will be the spreading of industrial and vocational information through the medium of moving pictures.

"The work of the bureau will be maintained through endowment funds and annuities," says the Chicago Sunday Examiner, of July 26. "No expense is involved for any institution to which these lectures or reels are sent; they are available, however, only when admittance to the public is free. The bureau will display its reels and slides not only in universities, colleges, technical and agricultural schools, high schools, public institutions, settlement houses, missions, commercial clubs, and at trade conventions, but also with powerful projectors, operated from auto trucks, in parks, playgrounds and other centers for the general public.

"A broad field of subjects and trades is covered in the films and lectures which the bureau is prepared to provide. There are ten headings, as follows: Mineral, agricultural, horticultural and forestry; animal husbandry; industrial, commerce and transportation; public health and service; social; domestic economy; historical; scientific; religious; travel. Under these headings practically every occupation is treated.

"The films which can be supplied give opportunity to see men in all sorts of actual work, from mining and refining ores to cultivating fields and orchards or carrying on the many activities planned to improve the life of the poor of the cities. It is only necessary to run through the bulletin of the bureau to find pictures on almost any theme that is desired. The bureau has already arranged for courses in eighteen states which will reach a student body of over 30,000."

Secret Service Officer Seizes Famous Players Films.

Captain Thomas I. Porter, head of the United States secret service in Chicago, who was invited by Second Deputy Superintendent of Police Funkhouser to be present on July 22 at the meeting of the municipal board of censorship, when viewing "The Little Gray Lady," a four-reel moving picture subject by the Famous Players Film Company, immediately confiscated the films after being run. Among the objectionable actions found in the films by Captain Porter were:

A young government clerk tearing small portions from bills and then putting them together, so as to form a $100 note. This is done a second time.

The clerk passes one of the spurious bills he has made.

The clerk is arrested by a secret service man. A friend of the clerk then appears and succeeds in bribing the officer, thus enabling the wrongdoer to flee the country.

"That is the most objectionable film I ever saw," said Captain Porter. "It shows bribery of government officials, and also criminality, because of the fact that the alleged hero is shown making this money."

Captain Porter's action attracts much attention, from the fact that the story of the films in question is adapted from a successful drama, written by Channing Pollock and acted many times before the public without any objections by government officers. Miss Jane Grey, who was the star in the stage production, is also the star in the photoplay.

Where Censorship Belongs.

Moving pictures are now filling such an important place in national life among all civilized peoples that they should reveal a nice discrimination in the selection of subjects and a similar discrimination in the method of production. If directing producers and manufacturers will only become their own censors in such matters, there will soon be an end to this Babel of censorship that now resounds throughout this country.

But the scenario editor must not be omitted from the list of those responsible for the outcries against certain films. He should, indeed, be held mainly responsible; for his fiat, in most cases, determines what stories shall be filmed and what shall be rejected.

It is truly astounding, at this advanced stage in the making of moving pictures, that any undesirable subjects should be permitted to pass the intelligent scrutiny of any reputable manufacturing film concern in this country. Laxity, no doubt, is partly induced in some cases by the tremendous demand for scenario material and the failure of the supply to meet it; but would it not be far better in the end for the manufacturer and the industry to reject the undesirable stories before money is expended on their production, rather than that he and the whole trade should suffer by the clamor for censorship?

It seems clear to me that the question of censorship, in a large measure, is in the hands of the manufacturers of films. Leading manufacturers have already recognized this, and other manufacturers, who are inclined to exploit the industry for personal gain, will find that they will be forced by the inexorable law of demand to conform with public opinion, or else fall hopelessly behind in the race for existence.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Phil H. Solomon, traveling representative of "The Spoilers," for F. O. Nielsen, returned from a two weeks' trip recently through Wisconsin and northern Michigan. He reported very warm weather and quite satisfactory bookings for "The Spoilers" in the large houses in the territory covered.

Fred W. Schaefer, of the Schaefer Theater Company, Inc., 5 South Wabash avenue, this city, returned Monday, July 27, from a western tour which was devoted to business and pleasure. Quite an extended visit was made in Colorado.

E. T. Peter, president of the Texas Film Corporation, Dallas, Texas, passed through the city on July 21 on his way to the scenes of his old home at Oconomowoc, Wis., where he will spend a vacation of several weeks. Mr. Peter stated that the conditions in film circles in Dallas are very promising.

J. L. Carlton, of the Carlton enterprises, New York City, also visited the city on the same date, and was seen with Mr. Peter. He left for St. Louis Tuesday evening, after which he returned to the city and will shortly leave on a trip to the Coast.

O. W. Holt, president of the Holt Feature Film Company, Manhattan, Kansas, paid a visit to the World office last week. The Holt Feature Film Company produces educational, industrial, scenic and special feature films. Mr. Holt stated that he was figuring on large contracts and that he was going to New York City in the interests of the general business of his company.

The Standard Motion Picture Company, 5 South Wabash avenue, this city, recently filmed German Celebration Day at the Federal League ball park. These pictures cover all the important proceedings of the day, and have been condensed to a single reel. They were booked by a number of theaters in the city, the first showing being at the Casino, on West Madison street.

J. H. Bunte, general sales manager of the Seeburg Piano Company, left his office Saturday, July 25, to spend a few weeks in northern Wisconsin. During his activities in the northern woods and lake region Mr. Bunte will endeavor to take off some of the superfluous avoirdupois acquired at his desk since his last vacation.

Among the unclaimed and abandoned merchandise recently sold at the United States appraisers' warehouse, West Harrison street, this city, was a film, entitled "Revolution in Mexico."

"Cabiria" is showing no signs of palling on the eyes of the multitudes that visit the Illinois Theater, where the spectacle is breaking all records. On the contrary, the sold-out sign appeared three times last week on the front of the theatre, and many were turned away disappointed.

It is whispered that the Annette Kellermann pictures in "Neptune's Daughter" have so popularized the Fine Arts

Theater that it may be used as a permanent film house during the winter. The rumor is that Alfred Hamburger's lease of the house has been extended.

The final presentations of "The Christian" were given at the Olympic Sunday, July 26. The house is now being redecorated, and will be in shape to receive "Potash and Perlmutter," which will open the regular theatrical season at the house, early in August.

It was announced, about the middle of the week of July 20, that the Studebaker would close its doors for the summer on Sunday, July 26, but the policy established by the management has been continued. On Monday, July 27, the Photoplay Productions Company presented "The Littlest Rebel," Edward Peple's well-known Civil War drama, done in films. This play made a big hit at the Chicago Opera House two seasons ago, with Dustin and William Farnum in the cast. E. K. Lincoln, the former Vitagraph star, heads the cast in the photoplay.

Major W. Gordon Lillie ("Pawnee Bill") was in the city last week. The chief object of his visit was to view Selig's big western photoplay, "In the Days of the Thundering Herd." All the principal scenes of this western photodrama were taken on "Pawnee Bill's" big ranch near Pawnee, Okla. Bessie Eyton is the heroine and Tom Mix the hero of the photoplay.

The Star Theater, 68 West Madison street, this city, was opened on Saturday, July 25. The opening program was "The Mother of Men," a three-reel military feature by Warners, and two soldiers paraded in front of the theater during the day. The entire building on Madison street, at the number mentioned, has been remodelled at an outlay of $60,000, in order to give space for this house. The location is considered one of the best in the city, and although the seating capacity is only 300 it is expected that the Star will do fine business. Only feature service, of all makes, will be used, and the admission will be 10 cents. The exterior of the theater is made especially attractive day and night by a spectacular rotating electric sign, which has been built by Marx Brothers, of this city. The sign covers a depth of two stories on the front and is considered one of the most attractive electric signs in the city. Bodkin & Keane, owners of the Star and Vaudette Theaters, in Evanston, have leased the building and theater for a term of years.

Perry E. Conner, of the cine department of the Eastman Kodak Company, paid us a pleasant call last week.

"One Wonderful Night," Essanay's big four-reel feature, was given its opening presentation at the Parkway Theater, Saturday, July 25. Mr. Nielsen informed me that it broke all records for the warm season.

Harold Martin, the operator in the Princess Theater, Galesburg, Ill., was overcome and was unconscious for thirty minutes as the result of breathing the combined gases in the fireproof booth during a recent fire. The audience had no knowledge of the fire whatsoever, as all the openings of the perfect booth closed automatically just as soon as the fire started. It was a close shave for Operator Martin, however.

The I. C. U. Film Company, this city, at a directors' meeting, held Monday, July 27, decided to investigate the possibilities of pictures of English industrial plants, and with that object in mind decided to send their secretary, William Stuart, to England at once. Mr. Stuart will sail on the Lusitania Tuesday, August 4.

"NEPTUNE'S DAUGHTER" CLOSES GLOBE RUN.

Owing to the necessity of Charles Dillingham needing the Globe Theater for rehearsals for his new productions, the engagement of Annette Kellermann in "Neptune's Daughter" terminated on Sunday evening, July 26, after a run of over two hundred performances, which, by the way, sets a high-water mark for this season in motion picture productions.

WORLD FILM RELEASING CHILD DRAMA.

"Tess of the Mountain Country," a very realistic and beautifully acted drama with an all-star juvenile cast, will be released shortly by the World Film Corporation. Small actors, mere babies, have the power to hold the attention of the audience and present a play which is not only pleasing but gratifying.

Horsley Adds to His Forces

Signs Up Harry Palmer, Newspaper Humorist, and Mr. and Mrs. Milton Fahrney.

HARRY PALMER, author of "Babbling Bess," one of the most popular and ingeniously humorous serial comics which have appeared in the daily newspapers, has been placed under contract by David Horsley, and will commence work for the Centaur Film Company on August 1. Mr. Palmer will make his headquarters at the Bayonne studio, where he will not only create the famous "I Didn't Do Nothin', But I Won't Do It Again" series, but will arrange them in scenario form and personally assist the stage directors in working them out before the camera.

Arrangements have already been made through the New York daily in which the drawings originally appeared to resume their publication in its columns and to have them appear simultaneously in fifty-one of the leading newspapers throughout the United States and Canada. This is the first step in Mr. Horsley's plan, recently announced, to produce seven one-reel comedies a week, and the only case on record of a prominent newspaper humorist conducting his entire campaign from a motion picture studio.

Milton Fahrney and his wife, Alexandra Phillips, have also been signed up by Mr. Horsley, and are now actively engaged in producing one-reelers for the Centaur Company. Both Mr. and Mrs. Fahrney are old-time Horsleyites, having been on the staff of the Bayonne producer for the last six years, doing their principal work on the Pacific Coast, where each earned a brilliant reputation. Mrs. Fahrney has won high honors as a scenario writer.

Mrs. Julia Hurley, remembered for many artistic performances in many productions, has so far recovered from her recent severe attack of grip that she has resumed her work in the six-reel production of "Il Travatore," which Charles Simone is now rushing to completion in the Centaur studio. Mrs. Hurley is portraying the witch, one of the most exacting parts in the piece, and it is said by those who have watched the progress of the production that she is giving the finest performance of her long professional career.

W. E. REEVES, BIG NICKEL, PORTLAND, ME.

IN the busiest part of the greatest thoroughfare of Portland, Me., is located one of the biggest straight motion picture houses in New England. It is known as the Big Nickel theater, the idea of a "Big Nickel" being intended to convey the meaning that it is a ten-cent house, as well as that it is a big house. Some appreciation of its bigness may be gained from the fact that it has 1,500 seats, all on one floor; and there is a large amount of floor space utilized for lobby and aisles; a finely furnished office, and a convenient and commodious entrance hall. The front of the main entrance is handsomely done in white, and is brilliantly lighted at night. The house makes a specialty of the Famous Players Film Company master-productions and has exclusive Mutual Film service.

William E. Reeves.

The genial and very capable manager of the Big Nickel is William E. Reeves. Mr. Reeves was born in Portland and has always made his home there. He is well known in the theatrical world, having been manager of the Big Nickel for the past three years. For five years he has been connected with the Greene and Abrams amusment enterprises, and previous to that he was connected with the old Portland theater, the New Porltnad, and B. F. Keith's theaters in that city. He has met with signal success in every position in which he has been placed, and is held in high esteem by the thousands of patrons of the Big Nickel as well as by his associates in theatrical circles.

Foreign Trade Notes

BRITISH NOTES.

THE Selig Company's motion picture serial revolving around the "Adventures of Kathleen" is now being issued. It is no exaggeration to say that it is being advertised on a scale more extensive than any other American production exhibited within these shores this year. Newspapers and posters are the media selected, and from the statement that running advertisements have been ordered in sixty leading provincial papers, apart from London, some adequate idea can be formed of the thoroughness with which E. H. Montagu is conducting the campaign.

A London film-renting house appears to have been collecting information and statistics in relation to the quantity of American films in this country, and reference is made in a circular to exhibitors of their prominence in British moving-picture programs. Last year 40 per cent. more films from the United States were imported to these shores than in the previous year, making the American contribution to our total film imports 60 per cent. On the other hand, films imported from Germany to Britain have decreased by 10 per cent., while the French and Italian imports remain unaltered.

The Irish-American producer, Walter Macnamara, has been actively at work at Kew producing a historical film from the chief incidents in Irish political life since 1782. From the time and money expended upon the production already the film, 7,000 feet in length, promises to be unusually good. Mr. Macnamara has sailed for America.

"Kismet," the Oriental mystery play which proved such a theatrical success two years ago, is the next stage masterpiece to be translated for the screen. A company has been registered in London to undertake this and will begin work shortly in the northern suburbs.

Museums in England will have their cinematograph rooms according to Curator of Public Museums Howarth at the Museums Association Conference. Classes from neighboring schools would attend the museum film sessions, according to the conference delegates, and obtain education under an authoritative guide. The danger to film pictures by the militant suffragettes is a problem now confronting the conference.

To eject a patron from a moving picture house before the program is finished is a breach of contract on the part of the management, according to Lord Justice Buckley, who has just dismissed an appeal against a judgment of £150 damages brought by the Picture Theaters, Ltd. A theater patron got the damages on assault charges. Lord Justice Phillimore's sympathies were with the picture people, but he said they broke their ticket contract when they ejected their patron. Lord Justice Kennedy concurred in the verdict, which is of much moment to film exhibitors here.

SOUTH AFRICA.

THE South African moving picture theaters, with very few exceptions, are now all controlled by the "African Films Trust, Ltd.," which causes a certain sameness about the performances all over the country. As the general manager of the trust said, laughingly, "What is shown here this week was in Cape Town last week and will be in Durban next week."

I went to the opulent looking offices of the trust the other day, and wondered how all this wealth of departments and employees could be the outcome of the receipts of shows which are resorted to principally by the lower middle class. And even so, the entrance prices of 2s., 1s. 6d., and 1s. are prohibitive to many. There is one bright little exception, the Tivoli, where, for 6d., one can see a good, varied and by no means vulgar program. This week I saw the beautiful Domino drama "True Irish Hearts," one of a long string of interesting features.

At the Carlton, "Orders Under Seal" was screened. In spite of the terrific booming of this Danish picture for the last three months in all the local papers, it is a good play, worthy to take its place with the best productions. The acting is refined, the photography splendid; otherwise there would be a danger of melodrama.

Space does not permit to write at length about the colossal venture of Mr. Schlesinger, the strongly silent director of the A. F. T. to put the whole of South Africa upon the screen, acted, filmed and produced here, by negroes and Africanders. The first part, "The Great Trek," is nearly completed.

MAURICE WEST, FAMILY THEATER, MONTREAL.

IN Maurice West one finds a young yet well-versed man in the departments of the moving picture and the theatrical business. Mr. West, who has been in Montreal seven years, is now managing the Family Theater, one of the Mark-Brock Amusement Company's houses, and is one of the most genial and successful exhibitors in the Canadian metropolis. He is a native of Worcester, Mass. Mr. West at one time managed the American tour of Constance Crawley and Arthur Maude, the well-known and gifted English artists, who only recently appeared before the camera. In looking over the field he found that Montrealers were exceedingly fond of vaudeville, but noted that only one house was endeavoring to supply the demand for this form of entertainment. He consequently opened a vaudeville booking agency—the first of its kind in the Canadian city. His motto, "Nothing too big or too small for me to handle," together with his genial disposition, brought him almost immediate popularity and success. Three years ago the People's Amusement Company were entering the Montreal field, and were looking for experienced men capable of managing vaudeville and moving picture theaters. Mr. West's successful career brought him to their notice. The People's Amusement Company's houses have since been taken over by the Mark-Brock Amusement Company of Buffalo, and Mr. West has been devoting energy and experience to the furthering of his principals' interest in Montreal. During the last three years Mr. West has managed the Alexandra, the Scala, and the Family theaters. Of the three, two are still owned by the Mark-Brock people—the Scala and the Family.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by CLARENCE E. SINN

Russell Sanborn, a Noted Boston Organist.

E. RUSSELL SANBORN, a prominent organist of Boston, is another convert to the moving picture. Last fall he was urged to play for a heavy photodrama, for which was wanted high-class organ music, but at that time he had never done anything of this sort and was afraid it might hurt his musical reputation. After much urging he accepted, making it a condition that he should have full sway regarding the selection and adaption of the music, and determined he would build up the character of moving picture music rather than let it injure his reputation musically. This was a very good resolution, as he found it a subject worthy of the serious attention of a good musician and not in the least injurious to a well-established reputation. His music for that photodrama proved a drawing card, for the people, after going to see the picture, went again to hear Mr. Sanborn's music. After playing this, he continued in the work, and his playing has been spoken of as the leading "music for pictures" in Boston.

Mr. Sanborn is a noted concert organist, and has in his studio the largest and most modern pipe organ for teaching purposes of any studio in this country—probably in the world. He has partially promised us an article on organ music for the pictures, which I am sure will be welcomed by the organists now playing in picture theaters. Mr. Sanborn has given organ recitals from coast to coast, and is well and favorably known by admirers of that instrument.

Of Interest to Organists.

C. R. Hartzell, organist at the Trianon Theater, Birmingham, Ala., sends us the following, which we would be pleased to have commented upon in a constructively critical way:

ORGAN MUSIC FOR THE TWO VANREVELS.

16. "Merango—Cuban Dance" (Stern) until title "Vive La Republic."
17. "Carmencita" (Feist) until end of reel.

Mr. Montgomery is playing with orchestra, leading with piano, and says he "humors" the music to the action; also plays piano and forte according to action. He adds: "I also notice some one wants 'geographical music.' Here are a few titles with publishers' names:

Ohio—"Ohio" (Remick).

Virginia—"When It's Springtime in Virginia" (Witmark).

Illinois—"In Dear Old Illinois" (Haviland).

Tennessee—"If I Get Back to Nashville, Tennessee" (Haviland).

Mississippi—"Mississippi Mamie" (Mills), "Mississippi Dippy Dip" (Stern), "Neath the Mississippi Moon" (Meyer).

Colorado—"She's Sleeping by the Silvery Rio Grande."

Georgia—"In Dear Old Georgia," "My Little Georgia Rose."

Alabama—"Alabama—Way Down Yonder."

California—"On San Francisco Bay" (Witmark), "Frisco Rag" (Von Tilzer), "Only Pal I Ever Had, Came from Frisco Town" (Remick).

New York—"Down Where the Silvery Mohawk Flows" (Stern), "Put Me Off at Buffalo," "Sidewalks of New York," "My Best Girl's a New Yorker."

Maryland—"Sailing Down Chesapeake Bay" (Remick), "On the 4-11-44 for Baltimore" (Witmark), "Back, Back, Back to Baltimore" (Remick).

Kentucky—"Kentucky Love" (Harms), "My Bill from Louisville" (Snyder), "I Am Looking for My Old Kentucky Home."

Florida—"Florida Flo."

Louisiana—"Louisiana Lou."

Texas—"My Heart's Tonight in Texas."

Arizona—"My Mona from Arizona."

New Hampshire—"My Old New Hampshire Home."

Gee! It must have taken a lot of trouble to dig all of those up. The correspondent who asked for them should be well pleased. It just goes to show that the world is full of helping hands, and if a fellow really wants anything (within reason) somebody, somewhere, is usually ready to help him out. Many thanks, Cousin George. Come again.

ALBERT ROCCARDI'S NOVEL MEDICINE.

Albert Roccardi, of the Vitagraph Players, who recently underwent a severe surgical operation, indirectly inaugurated a new use for motion pictures. While in the hospital and unable to move, he thought of his picture, "Uncle Bill," now being shown at the Vitagraph Theater, in which he cavorts around like a two-year-old. Realizing his helplessness, he became remorseful and was firmly convinced that he would never be able to move again. His condition seriously retarded his recovery. His surgeon learned the reason, called up the Vitagraph studio and arranged for a private showing of "Uncle Bill," which Roccardi had never seen, to be given in his hospital room. The showing of the picture acted like magic. The sick man was soon laughing at his antics on the screen and his ambition was rekindled. In less than a week he walked out of the hospital, and both surgeon and patient ascribe the rapid recovery to the influence of a picture.

Camera in Construction History

Through Medium of Pictures Animated Record of Exposition's Building Is Unfolded to Whole World.

By Alfred G. Andersen.

THE Panama-Pacific International Exposition is the first undertaking of its kind to be conveyed as an animate reality in every stage of its evolution from ground-breaking to opening day to the very doors of the inhabitants of the most distant corners of the world. The film is the medium through which this epoch-making task is being carried out. Thanks to the perfection of the moving picture process, the people of China, South Africa, Australia, India, Europe and the American continent have followed the growth of the great Exposition City at San Francisco from a desolate stretch of waste land to the magnificent fairy city it is today as closely as have the citizens of San Francisco themselves, and every ceremony that has occurred on the grounds has in this manner been attended by the inhabitants of every town and village of the world where a moving picture house exists. Even the most ignorant peasant in the backwoods of Russia and the coolie of the Indian jungle, people who cannot write their own names, have in this fashion been treated to a course of instruction in building construction from the laying of the cornerstone to the last touch of the painter's brush. It is the greatest single enterprise that has ever been undertaken in the moving picture industry. The firm of Miles Brothers of San Francisco, the Exposition's official motion picture photographers, alone has taken 100,000 feet of film of the Exposition, to which must be added numerous reels taken privately by other moving picture concerns, and by railroad companies. The number of "scenes" or "situations" recorded approaches half a million. The camera advertising of all previous expositions has been confined to a few isolated and lifeless lantern slides.

The first film taken of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition records the breaking of ground by President Taft on October 14, 1911, a ceremony that was attended by 100,000 people on the spot where it actually occurred and later witnessed by countless millions in moving picture houses throughout the world, as has been the case with every ceremony held on the grounds since. About six weeks later the writer attended a moving picture show in far-away Manila. The program included an edition of Pathe's Weekly, recording a week's principal events in the big world. One of these was the Exposition ground-breaking ceremony at San Francisco, which was thus witnessed in all its lifelike details by a heterogeneous audience composed of several hundred Americans, three or four times as many Filipinos, and a liberal sprinkling of Europeans and Chinese in a tropical land many thousands of miles away from the actual scene. To make the spectacle all the more realistic, the big Manila audience gave vent to a round of enthusiastic applause as the President of the United States dug the spade into the ground and turned the first lump of earth on the Exposition site, just as the spectators at San Francisco did. About the same time the same animated scene was witnessed by audiences in thousand of other motion picture houses throughout the world.

Incidentally, a certain pathos attaches to this particular film, for it was the last picture taken of the late Mayor Archibald Butt, who was then military aid to President Taft. A few months later this gallant officer heroically sacrificed his life in order to save women and children in the awful Titanic disaster. The same picture showed also the late Madame Nordica, the American queen of opera, and the late Charles de Young, son of the publisher of the San Francisco Chronicle, who was in charge of the ground-breaking ceremonies.

The next film was taken on March 14, 1912, and showed the starting of actual work on the Exposition, together with the first ceremonies of a building site dedication on the grounds on the same reel. The same day a film was taken of the dumping of heavy rocks into San Francisco Bay to complete the breakwater inclosing that portion of the Exposition grounds which had to be reclaimed. A month later, on April 13, the moving picture camera was set in motion again to record the starting by Charles C. Moore, President of the Exposition, of the dredger John McMullen, which pumped 300,000 cubic yards of silt from the bay into what is now a good portion of the area occupied by the main exhibit palaces.

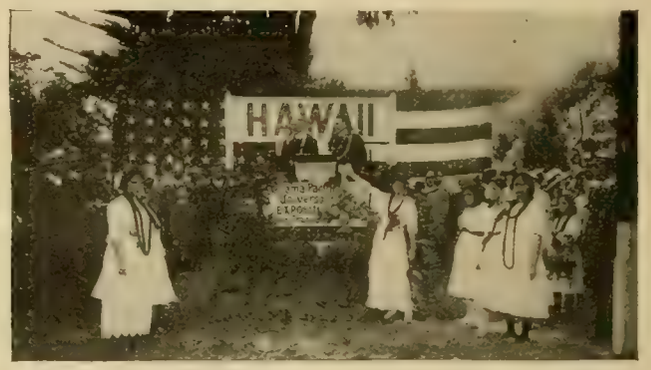
Thus three important steps in the fundamental construction of the Exposition City were given to the world in motion pictures: The ground-breaking by President Taft, the completion of the break-water guarding the reclaimed area, and the starting of the dredger which pumped the silt into the reclaimed portion of the grounds. The people of all lands saw how the Exposition builders went about their task of creating the ground for the great celebration. It was a revelation to engineers and an education to laymen.

As time advanced and the task of reclaiming and leveling the ground was superseded by the work of building construction, the motion picture cameraman became more active. Instead of appearing on the scene once a month or less, he first came several times a week and finally every day. Every ceremony held under the auspices of the Exposition, every site dedication and every ground-breaking celebration has been faithfully recorded in detail by the untiring cameraman and shown with minute precision to interested multitudes of moving picture audiences the world over.

On September 5, 1913, the French Commission, headed by M. Albert Tirman, dedicated the site of France's Exposition Building. It was a magnificent celebration, attended by high government officials, officers of the army and navy, Exposition officials and thousands of spectators. Half a dozen moving picture cameras recorded the impressive ceremonies, and two weeks later the people of Paris witnessed how the French Commissioners had been feted on the Exposition grounds at San Francisco. A few weeks later the same event was witnessed by French moving picture audiences in New Caledonia, French Indo-China, Morocco and French Guiana.

In like manner the people of other countries have been shown where their pavilions are located on the Exposition grounds and how the sites have been dedicated with pompous ceremonies by their respective commissioners. The same applies of course to the different states and territories of the United States.

A novel film taken by Miles Brothers shows the complete construction of the great Palace of Machinery in half an hour. The actual time consumed in its construction was ten months. A moving picture camera, protected from rain and sun by a hood, was placed on top of the Service Building on the Exposition grounds and pointed toward the huge machinery structure the day the work of construction was begun. Every five minutes the camera snapped a picture automatically. It recorded ninety-five pictures a day for ten months, at the expiration of which the palace was completed. On the screen the spectator sees the immense edifice rising slowly from the ground until it appears in its completed state at the end of thirty minutes. Aside from its general novelty and interest, this film has a tremendous educational value for structural engineers and builders.



Breaking Ground for Hawaiian Pavilion, San Francisco.

Another Exposition film of absorbing interest is that recording from four different angles the blowing up of Gamboa dyke and the attendant ceremonies on October 10, 1913. When President Wilson pressed the button in the White House at Washington, there was a host of moving picture men present in San Francisco at a simultaneous celebration to record the event, and at the same time moving picture cameras were busy at Gamboa photographing the bursting asunder of the huge mass of earth and rock.

Such great film manufacturers as Pathe, Universal, Gaumont and Selig have taken numerous moving pictures of events and scenes at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition for their celebrated weekly pictorial news, which have been shown to audiences in all lands and climes. The result of the extensive use of motion pictures to record the history of the great international celebration at San Francisco in 1915 is that practically every visitor, no matter what part of the world he may come from, arrives with a thorough preconceived idea of what he may expect to see, and those who have not the means for making the long journey may actually attend the Exposition at home; the motion picture brings it right to their doors.

Doings at Los Angeles

HERE is a good conundrum, conceived by Cecil De Mille and Fred Kley, of the Lasky studio. They incorporated the titles of every picture they have done at the new studio. Here it is: "If The Squaw Man was The Only Son of The Virginian and had The Master Mind of The Ghost Breaker, would Brewster's Millions keep The Man on the Box from hearing The Call of the North?" We added – No, but Hollywood.

At the Jardin de Danse, a terpischorean temple of tango, Monday nights are Movie nights, and last week Cleo Madison of the Universal was the queen of the floor. All the stars of filmdom are to be honored at these balls.

This sounds rather funny, but it is true. Albert W. Hale, director of Kalem comedies at Santa Monica, produced his third Kalem story last week, and on the 13th, while doing Scene 13, the camera buckled the film, and a retake on the spot had to be taken. Later the film was spoiled, and a later retake had to be made. Mr. Hale is not superstitious, but he does not like 13s.

It is said that several prominent men here are starting the Twentieth Century Players Film Company, which will be a daily news producer, sending out film, it is said, fifteen minutes after the event happens. The company-to-be is negotiating for state contracts and expects to start work soon.

Rollin S. Sturgeon and a company of Vitaplayers, including Otto Lederer, Anne Schaefer, George Holt, Mary Ruby, and others, have returned from a ten days' excursion into the heart of the desert, where they did some wonderful American Sahara scenes. They report a hot time and trip, but say that the people up there treated them royally.

Harry Carr, editor of the Pink Sheet of The Times here, wrote a good script and sold it to the Universal for Herbert Rawlinson to star in. It is "Kid Reagan's Hands" and is a story of the life of a pug. Rawley certainly did well in the ring, for he is a regular athlete.

Saturday evening the Oz Film Company ran the first four reels of its new feature, "The Patchwork Girl of Oz." This was the first time any of the pictures had been seen on the screen, and all who saw the film pronounced it wonderful. This picture abounds in wholesome comedy, and is strange and enchanting in its quaint situations and marvelous transformations. The trick effects are most surprising. The film will be released about the first.

The Balboa company spends in Long Beach each month about $5,000. This proves that it is rather comforting to have a well-organized and permanent company operating in one's city. The people there appreciate that fact, too. Nothing is too good for the players, and any scenes desired are always at the disposal of the directors.

The Mutual Players are putting on a comical film, "A Physical Culture Romance," which shows a beautiful girl, an athlete, winning the man of her choice from a rival. Her physical development aids her greatly in the suit. Margaret Edwards and Fay Tincher are the girls and Tod Browning is the boy.

In "The Ghost Breaker," being put over at the Lasky studio, a barrel of rats are used in one scene. Some white rats were bought and doused with lamp black. This was their make-up. All day they waited for their scene, and after being used were returned to their dressing rooms.

Many famous stage people are to be found at the new plant of the Oz Company, among them being Violet Macmillan, Marie Wayne and Ben Dealy. Fred Woodward is also here doing animal impersonations. He is the "woozy," a wonderful mythical animal that flashes fire from its eyes and sets fences afire.

Irene Hunt and Bob Burns are being featured by F. A. Kelsey in a great newspaper story being produced at the Mutual. A good setting was the interior of a big daily here. The story is a good one.

Jack Adolfi, directing "The Inner Conscience" at the Mutual, recently was an impromptu life guard, together with Frank Bennett and Sam De Grasse. Olive Tuller Golden, playing the lead, was supposed to be rescued from the water. All was ready for the scene to be rehearsed, and the director had not instructed the lady in details, but the rehearsal started. The director became satisfied and told her to stop. She heeded not his words, and soon the three men jumped in thinking she was really drowning, but found that she was only doing her best to make it a good scene. Miss Golden is a powerful swimmer, but before the scene was being made she had not advised Adolfi of her aquatic ability.

CLARKE IRVINE.

HENRY S. NORTHRUP.

HENRY STOBO NORTHRUP, of the Vitagraph players, was born in Paris, France, July 31, 1877. His father, Nelson A. Northrup, was born in Elmira, N. Y., and is a descendant of a Northrup who arrived in Boston in 1664. Helen Wallace Stobo was the maiden name of Henry Northrup's mother. She came from Glasgow, Scotland. Mr. Northrup, or Harry, as he is known to his friends, attended the public schools in San Francisco, finishing his education at the University of California. After leaving college, he joined the Frawley Stock Company of San Francisco, this not only being his first moneymaking position, but also his first theatrical engagement. The stock company experience was the stepping stone to greater achievements for Mr. Northrup, as his love for the work and his natural ability soon won for him an enviable reputation as an actor. He attracted the attention of influential Eastern managers, and it was not long before he was offered a Broadway engagement which resulted in his staying in New York, on Broadway, for eighteen years, appearing in the support of such eminent stars as E. H. Sothern, Henry Miller, Mary Mannering, William Faversham, Bessie Tyree, Virginia Harned and Wilton Lackaye, playing important leading parts in "The Round-Up" and "The Heir to the Hoorah," and starring in Clyde Fitch's last comedy, "Girls." One of his most important New York engagements enabled him to appear at Daly's Theater for twenty-six consecutive weeks.

Henry Stobo Northrup.

Mr. Northrup's advent as a motion picture artist was at the request of one of the Vitagraph heads. He did not care for the silent drama at first, but the fascination of posing before the camera became stronger as he became accustomed to the work and he is now a staunch adherent of the picturized story. The most important pictures in which Mr. Northrup has appeared include "The Test," "Vanity Fair," "The Christian," "The Painted World," "Four Thirteen," "The Right of Way" and "Under the Daisies." His Lord Robert Ure, the "heavy" in "The Christian," was a marvellous characterization.

EMERGENCY ROOM AT THE STRAND.

The Strand Theater has now a fully equipped emergency room where patrons or employees of the theater can receive medical attention in case of accident or sudden illness. The Strand has every conceivable innovation for the comfort and safety of its patrons, and in spite of the fact that the management realizes that the emergency room might never be actually used, no expense has been spared in fitting up the room in which reclining chairs and cots have been placed. A large assortment of surgical dressings, antiseptic solutions, medicines and drugs and general anaesthesia are placed in a large cabinet made for the purpose. Dr. J. Victor Wilson has been placed in charge of this department, and the employees are given instructions in first aid to the injured, under his direction twice weekly.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

THE moving picture people of this city are awaiting with great interest the outcome of the latest censorship fight in Philadelphia. It presents phases which are, in many respects, novel and which differ from those that developed in similar contests in other parts of the country, although the the main question at issue is the same—the constitutionality of official censorship. The film brought to the front in the issue is "John Barleycorn," which is heralded as a powerful temperance sermon based upon personal experiences of the author. The chairman of the Pennsylvania State Board of Censors is determined that the action in the film shall be toned down and the representatives of the producers are equally resolute that the picture be produced in its entirety. To this end the latter will endeavor to restrain the censors from interfering with the production of the film by carrying the question into the courts and attacking the constitutionality of the law which created the Board of Censorship.

One of the novel phases of the case is that the producers are fighting the Board of Censorship armed with written indorsements of the subject from ministers, church, temperance and Young Men's Christian Association workers. In other words, we find the people who have persistently fought for censorship arrayed with the producers against the board of their own creation. The controversy has become a bitter one, so much so that the chairman of the Censorship Board objecting to the picture is charged with taking the view of the brewery interests by toning down the powerful temperance sermon involved in the production.

It is but fair to say that the accused official declares that he is a total abstainer and that he is not connected with the liquor interests. And, in the minds of many who have been discussing the case here, it is immaterial whether or not he has such connections.

* * *

The stand the official has taken for the first time brings to the front a test of how much the censorship agitators are willing to give and take in the fight they are making. Thus far they have shown absolutely no disposition to concede anything. In the present case there is opportunity to force them to show their hand and see if they can be induced or forced to be at all liberal in the consideration of all concerned. It is not at all improbable that, should the controversy partake of this character, it may be shown that official censorship is not alone inimical to the moving picture interests, but that it also infringes upon the rights of other industries and citizens. It may forecast a situation wherein other than professional reformers may make demands upon the Boards of Censors.

A man of this city prominently identified with the liquor interests had considerable to say on the matter. "I realize that whatever I might say on the subject," said he, "would carry little weight in conveying to the reformers my ideas as to what is just and equitable, because they naturally would charge that prejudice actuated any argument I might make. But let me tell you that this Philadelphia case embodies some very important points. Being connected with the liquor business and knowing the campaigns that have been conducted against us for years by the same people who have been boosting the censorship question I have watched developments closely. The chief cry the reformers have made to get censorship has been against immorality in the moving pictures. This is their cry today, although they have been unable to show that 10 per cent. of the pictures exhibited have not been censored, or that half that percentage, or even a quarter, are immoral pictures. To them, I have observed, this is of no importance. They want official censorship regardless of all claims made in favor of the pictures.

"The fight made by the Philadelphia official," continued the liquor dealer, "is one that will invoke the attention of the liquor interests throughout the country. The liquor industry and traffic is legalized by the government, and those engaged in it are entitled to the same protection as all other citizens so long as they observe the laws. My position is that if this film story of 'John Barleycorn' contains exaggerated or ridiculous situations that tend to unjustly work against the liquor interests, those interests have a right to demand that such parts be eliminated, regardless of the indorsements given by the reformers and church and temperance workers. If we are to have boards of censorship for the films they must act in the interests of the people at large and not limit their operations to the benefit of a particular sect or class. Commercial interests and private rights in all quarters must be protected by the boards, and if the laws under which they are created do not permit this the whole structure is unconstitutional. I can realize how eager the reform element is to have such topics placed before the public in the most forcible light that can be given them; I know, and they know, that the moving picture as a factor in the temperance field has practically outclassed the platform work by recognized practical results. Records will show that thousands of saloonkeepers have been put out of business by them. But if such pictures go beyond the bounds of reason, casting undue reflections upon us people and creating false notions regarding us and our business the boards of censorship must set matters right."

Another who took part in the discussion said he thought the greatest mistake of the whole situation has been the refusal of the reform element to concede that there has been any virtue in the views of others than themselves. This blindness has served only to create political berths at the expense of innocent people. "These people," said he, "are inconsistent. Their surveillance of regular moving pictures is of the most rigid character to detect the slightest suggestion of offense, while subjects conveying their own ideas of propriety are indorsed, regardless of the force given them, or others who may be offended."

A moving picture man said the latest Philadelphia case is another confirmation of what the people in the picture business have predicted from the time official censorship was first agitated. It is a strife-breeding measure, with no more practical purpose attached to it than the creation of political offices. "The one unique point brought out by the case," said the exhibitor, "is the refusal of the censor to pass the picture without eliminations, although it is strongly indorsed by churches and religious societies. It is almost a daring independent stand to take, but it is a good one, I think, for it brings to notice for the first time that boards of censorships should not be maintained solely as instruments in the hands of those who caused their creation.

"I am not interested in the liquor interests' arguments, for the reason that I have never become convinced that moving pictures impress themselves upon the minds of those that see them, as many people contend they do. Take the old play of 'Ten Nights in a Bar-room.' There was a hummer that conveyed as strong a temperance lesson as can be given, but I do not think any saloonkeeper or liquor dealer was put out of business by it. I do not believe the stories that people have been led to commit crimes by reason of impressions received from motion pictures; nor do I believe that such impressions put saloonkeepers out of business.

"I know that picture houses have forced the closing of saloons, in many parts of the country where the working people predominate; but that was because many of such people found in the picture places a source of recreation which they preferred to bar-rooms. In the majority of the smaller towns of the country the men coming home from work at factories, mines, mills, etc., had only the saloons and pool and billiard rooms to turn to in the evenings until the development of the moving picture business brought the small theaters to their doors and a boon to themselves and families. In my own house I run all the best pictures I can get, and among them I class temperance themes, provided the story is well put together and the subject is in keeping with my regular run. It never occurs to me that when I run temperance-teaching pictures that I am antagonizing my saloon-keeping neighbor, nor when I put on a picture showing the rascality and punishment of a storekeeper do I feel that I have cast a reflection upon my friend Hans, the grocer near me. Nevertheless, I believe that the people who are so exacting in the elimination from pictures of those things which touch their sensibilities should show enough of the good side of human nature to enable them to insist that the sensibilities of others be not unnecessarily offended."

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

House Program?

SWINGING into line, the Topnotch Indicator, the house organ of the M. P. Sales Agency, London, prints this argument in favor of the right sort of house program:

> When we see a picture palace program bounded on north, east, south and west by the advertisements of local tradespeople, we always feel that the manager of that theater is bartering away one of his most valuable assets. It stands to reason that if spaces on a program are worth good money to the butcher, the baker and the local laundry, those spaces must also be of no small value to the exhibitor himself.
> Indeed, for a few shillings the exhibitor is disposing of advertising space worth as many pounds to his theater. Were he to utilize a good portion of the program in advertising forthcoming feature and exclusive films, he would gain far more in business than he would lose in advertisement revenue. Let part of your program by all means, but take care to reserve some of the best positions for your own advertising announcements. It will pay you,

We are in favor of some foreign advertising, enough, in fact, to pay the cost of publication, if the charge to the outsider is sufficient to pay publication costs without almost entirely crowding out the matter for the house, but we have always argued that if the space is worth money to the grocer or the butcher, it should be worth money to the house manager—perhaps more money than is received from the outside sources.

The great trouble is that a manager starts a program and takes a few outside advertisements. He is not a good solicitor and so he gets the advertisements not because he has something valuable to sell, but because he sells something of value so cheaply. He regards all of this money as "velvet." It is money that comes in in checks and bills; hard money, and so he sells more and more space, crowds his own program and announcements into smaller compass and thinks he is making money.

It may be that he is, but it does not look that way to us, for he looks to the program returns and not to the box receipts. He sees that his program nets him $18 a week. He thinks he is making that $18, where it may be that if he took that $18 worth of space himself it would earn him $36. The $18 is something definite and tangible. He can see that his program earns it. He cannot see that if Smith and Jones and Brown give him $18 for advertising, it is because they will make more than $18 from its use. He does not stop to consider that $18 worth of space in his own program may be worth more than $18 to him, and so he crowds what he thinks is his advantage until he is printing the program on the edges of the sheets instead of on the faces. Then people stop reading the program, and Brown and Smith and Jones stop using the space because the program no longer interests, and the manager has nothing at all.

Crowding the Program.

In the column opposite is a page from the Third Street Theater Program, Easton, Pa. But we want to add that the Third Street uses a half column of reader and two full pages of well-chosen house stuff in each issue, so we do not give them as a "horrible example," but to show how some houses similarly sell their space without reserving two pages for the chat that makes the publication known and read. In passing we might add that lately the Third Street has at last followed our repeated suggestion that where this form of make-up is used the program be boxed in with heavy rule. It looks much better than it did a couple of issues ago. Without the saving of two pages this program would be a waste of money so far as the house is concerned, but those two pages help a lot.

As a broad proposition, at least one-third of the space should go to the house. A full half would be even better. The remainder should sell at a price that will permit the publisher to come clear of his expense. The trouble is that too many offer space for too little. It is all that space in some programs is worth, because it is not a readable sheet, offering nothing but a catalogue of films. But where the program carries a proportion of reading matter that interests, the circulation becomes highly specialized. It reaches all homes in the vicinity of the advertiser's store, it is paid for on the basis of those reached and not the general circulation that a daily paper gives, and it is read by a large number of probable purchasers. In the cities the house organ of the locality theater is a better medium than the general daily paper because it reaches only those in the neighborhood and reaches those reasonably well. It is not what you pay or what you get that counts. It is what you get for what you pay. The two factors must be considered jointly.

Looking Forward.

We believe that in the course of time the photoplay theater program will carry the national advertising precisely as the dramatic theaters now advertise the nationally advertised goods, but the program of the dramatic house carries reading matter on practically every page to coax the reader to peruse every page, and the photoplay theater must do the same. Already there are companies offering colored cover programs at very low prices. The next step will be the partly printed program supplied free by the printers in return for the fact that the national advertising is carried, the local man getting his return from the local advertising that is added.

Already there are many men who can get out a program that is worth taking home and reading all the way through, and the number is increasing as other managers come to realize the value of the attractive house program in contrast with the cheap sheet that cannot possibly interest.

Dramatic theaters count on the program privilege as a certain asset and some of the larger theaters get upward of $10,000 a year from the program publishers and do nothing but supply the copy for the house matter. It is not yet possible to do this in many sections since the program is not received sufficiently far in advance, but this is an evil that is being gradually eradicated. There is a brilliant future for the house organ. It remains only for the managers to realize the promise.

Slow but Good.

We have always contended to John Williams Kellette that New Rochelle was a slow town. Now we can prove it. The Neptune theater came out June 2d with a letter written April 25th. That is no great speed for the home of the Thanhouser company, but the text is good still. It is a doorknob special and reads:

> It has just come to my notice that a short time ago you were offered an attractive price for the rental of your theater, for a few days, by an individual who desired to exhibit on your screen a feature called "The Traffic of White Slaves." This tempting offer was made you during the cold weather, when your business I imagine was not very good and I presume the amount tendered would have helped you out financially.
> In spite of this, you refused the offer on the grounds, I am told, that the showing of such a picture would be an irreparable detriment to the morals of children and young people.

I wish, Mr. Fercken, to highly commend you for this act of integrity on your part, for it clearly shows that you are in the business to exhibit only the highest class of photoplays; and that you are endeavoring to exclude from your theater features of such immoral and objectionable order.

I sincerely trust that you will continue to live up to this policy, and I will, whenever the opportunity presents itself, speak in the highest terms of the Neptune theater and its management. Very respectfully yours,

Mrs. M. Magnin,
(Local Censor)

Note—I sincerely thank you Madam. Your presumption is correct. The tempting offer to make some easy money and enjoy a few days' vacation was indeed hard for me to forego.

That makes good advertising for a family house, but it should have been run sooner. At least there is one manager who looks beyond the days and sees that the ten dollars of the moment is not as big as the dollar a week for weeks and weeks.

She Gave a Party.

Olive Robertson, daughter of J. T. Robertson, of the Lyric theater, Libertyville, Ill., is a fortunate young miss, for every birthday she gives a theater party at her father's theater and invites her teachers and schoolmates to see a special program. This year there were about 200 guests at the special performance. Olive is the little girl in the checked dress under the first "s" in "harness." Her father writes that he does not contribute to this department, though he likes both this and the projection department. We shall have to get the Sheriff after him if he does not come across with some other advertising ideas, though this is both a novel advertisement and a pretty fancy. Take two hundred children and give them a thoroughly good time (and mind you Mr. Robertson also conducts a restaurant) and we think that business and pleasure will walk hand in hand.

Costly, but Good.

Royale V. Rotherwood, of the General Film Company's Kansas City branch, sends in an advertisement got up by C. F. Mensing, of the Mensing Amusement Company, operating the Lyceum, Orpheum, Gem and Palm theaters, Leavenworth, Kansas. It is this card:

Where the fist points a perfectly good buffalo nickel is pasted on the card. When a man not only urges you to come but incloses the price, the least you can do is to go. This is an expensive advertisement, but to make business it is worth what it costs. It is just the proper size to go in a 6 3-4 envelope on which is printed a large red "Lost!"

We wish that more exchange managers would be good enough to send on the ideas that are turned in to them.

Gee! Here's Winstock.

Melvin G. Winstock still has his castor in the ring while waiting for his new house in Portland, Oregon. He writes:

I don't blame you for thinking that I was dead. In fact, quite by accident, some person did spread the rumor a few days ago here that I had dropped dead from heart disease. It may have started from some one who hopes that event will occur before the new National Theater opens in September. As a matter of fact, however, I am rather a busy corpse, putting in fully 14 hours a day watching two shifts of about one hundred men each gradually rounding out the great structure in form. Contracts with a penalty large enough to make it worth while call for the completion of the theater part by September 20 and the offices and stores by October 1.

I have a neat project designed to popularize the National even before it opens. I am sending two boys and two girls with a chaperone to the Panama Exposition at 'Frisco. The boys and girls are selling coupon books of tickets of admission With each book there is a certain voting power and in addition they earn 10 per cent. on what they dispose of. It is now vacation time and quite a goodly number are out hustling and the results are fine. The various state societies are also taking up the project and I shall offer a series of trips to them also on the same plan. My children's play ground, in charge of a professional play leader, is being talked about a great deal. I succeeded in convincing my associates that it would be a wise idea to allow our employees to own stock, and as a result the more important positions will be held by competent people who will be directly interested in the profits.

It may sound like "bull" to say it, but I absolutely could not exist as a motion picture man without the Moving Picture World.

An Airdome Front.

Luke J. Scott, of Warrensburg, Mo., is the only one yet to respond to our request for airdome fronts. The display shows the movable frames Mr. Scott wrote about, but not all are in use. Mr. Scott has just been bumping over the local feature. He induced a commercial company to film a school pageant, but when the school would not promise to purchase a copy, he had a hard time inducing the company to finish up 700 feet which was put out as a feature, and which ran for three nights to only 1100 persons, most of whom kicked at the photographic quality. The idea was all right, but there seems to be something the matter with the town people. It must be disccuraging to run in an apathetic locality like that. The Alumni Association sold tickets on a percentage basis with a house-to-house canvass, and there was plenty of advertising. We don't blame Mr. Scott for hoping for an opening in some live town where his hustle will be better responded to.

Showy.

H. S. Ellis, of the Masonic theater, Hinton, West Virginia, calls this an "everyday" front, and explains that he uses 22x28 photographs of the star players, in addition to a banner and posters, and smaller pictures for those featured in the single reels. This makes a showy and attractive lobby and the balancing of the important stars with the smaller one reel pictures gives an orderly effect. Mr. Ellis, however, did not have the large pictures of Miss Cunard and Mr. Ford. This is a good example of a lobby carrying about all the pictorial matter that the house can stand without carrying a sheet too much.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Sensation.

WE cannot blame the writer who recently wrote: "Is it necessary to have some sensational incident in your story, if the story can be better told without it? I am moved to make this inquiry by seeing in so many advertisements the recapitulation of the sensational features of the releases offered."

You cannot blame a writer for wondering if sensation is necessary to a sale when the advertising pages are crowded with cuts of sinking ships, racing automobiles and falling aeroplanes, but these are not stories that are offered, they are merely sensations with some incidents, as a rule, and a majority of the patrons of photoplay want plays and not wrecked autos.

Lacking the tense, gripping story, something can be done with the manufactured story that is wrapped around some sensational scene, but these can be prepared best by the studio or order writer and it is useless to compete with the man who knows just what is wanted, but there is always a good market with the regular companies for the story that really is a story, that is interesting because of the narrative and not on account of the extraneous features that are introduced to bolster up a weak cause. Mechanical punch is not the true punch, but it is made to do where the genuine article is lacking and a story of some sort must be had.

Lately there has been a marked reversion to the one-reel script, and the man who will keep on writing stories instead of looking for chances to sneak a bomb under an unsuspicious tugboat will make the most money in the next two years.

Censorship.

It's getting to the point where pretty soon an author will not be able to write any sort of story without running afoul of some censorship individual's private dislikes. The other day we suggested to Arthur Hotaling that we would presently be writing stories about animals and he pointed out that probably the S. P. C. A. would step in on that. But the situation is reaching a point where it ceases to be humorous.

Checked Slips.

Louis B. Siegel writes that one script of his came back from two companies and the first editor marked it "Plot too slight" and the next "Plot too complicated." Then some other people write that some editors are real mean because they will not help the novice by telling him what the matter is.

Mr. Siegel also writes:

> I notice now and then you give a warning not to read over your columns hastily, but to study them. I never thought this would have any meaning to me, but that it was meant for others. But since I have been unbinding the "World," that is taking the pins out and removing your columns and placing them together and making a small volume, I found in reading the back numbers that most of the "meat" was as interesting as ever, and I got out information I overlooked some previous time. I now at my leisure time take out my Photoplaywright and read it over and over again.

If the stuff in this department is any good when it is written, it is just as applicable a year from now. It is not what you read, but what you read and understand that counts. Keep the back files and study them. You may have passed over an item then that now has a direct bearing on some recent trouble of your own.

Working Methods.

One correspondent writes that he thinks up six plots, picks out the best two and works on these, passing from one to the other and developing them tandem. We know of a writer for the dramatic stage who works on all the acts of his play at the same time, passing from one act to the other as he tires of one situation, but we think that it is a better plan to stick to one idea until it is done, and use all the plots as soon as they get ripe. It is possible to have a dozen or more incomplete plots stirring around in one's brain, but as a rule it is well not go to the machine with one until it is about ready to be put on paper. If you think of an idea and it does not seem just right, make a note of it, then put it aside until you are ready for it, and in time it will work right if you have had enough experience. Have only one plot to work on paper, but have a lot of plots sprouting in your brain and keep turning them over and over until you hit on the right treatment. The story that seems impossible to-day may be to-morrow's hit. It doesn't pay to have only one idea at a time, nor yet only six.

Getting Plots.

William Wright Farmer says in a recent letter:

> Plots come to me largely from viewing some object, for instance some folks look at an old board fence, and the fence is all they see. I can see the fence and more; I see a giant forest, the lonesome wood chopper, the saw mills, the means of transportation, the planing mill, the carpenter and the finished fence, and every act in the construction of that fence opens up either the basic idea of a plot or suggests some interesting incident. Plots are in everything I see. The other day I saw a man hanging a picture of his mother on the wall. It flashed in my mind that I had a mother who was dead, memories came thick and fast and soon I said: "If I were real bad and left my mother and went away and neglected to write her for years and suddenly I was to be confronted with a picture of her as she was when she kissed me good-by, don't you think I would want to come home?" On this thought I wove a plot probably not suitable for production, but yet it demonstrated to me that everything I looked at had more behind it than just what I saw at first glance. I have never known the time when I could not find some interesting incident behind the object.

That first instance is all right as an illustration, but it does not yield a photoplay plot. It's all very well to see the giant forest, the lonesome wood chopper and all the rest, but that does not make a plot. It might make a good industrial story, but they are not buying industrials. The thing to do is to train the imagination to have the board fence suggest something that will work into a photoplay.

That same board fence—possibly because it was so low—might suggest a high spite fence. That might make a good comedy or it might work into a tragedy, but a giant forest is not a photoplay possibility unless there are a man and a woman under the branches and a story of life in progress. Mr. Farmer has the right idea, each step suggests an idea. The neglected mother plot, too, is a bit ancient, but Mr. Farmer has the underlying idea of seeing something suggestive in anything. A hundred people might write a hundred plots suggested by a board fence, and there might not be a single fence of any sort in any one of the hundred stories. If you see a board fence and write a board fence story, you might write the same story that would be suggested to another man, writing about a board fence, but if you see a board fence and write a story about a man who thought of a great advertising scheme and won the girl's father with it, it is less likely that the other fellow will also have noticed that the board fence carried a sign that stated that "Hickory Hops Helps the Helpless." That is the way to use a board fence in getting ideas.

Oh, Well.

Here is the sort of letter that comes in more often than we like to see them. The writer says:

> Your article in the issue of the "World" under date of 20th inst. entitled "Not Story Alone" and "Merwin's Message," has interested me considerably. Your reference to the building of the house reminds me of the instructions that most companies give for writing photoplays.
> They say get a typewriter and some paper, write only on one side, follow our style of play, and always send a stamped self-addressed envelope for the return of your script. Doing the above does not sell your scripts any more than buying the material for building the house will enable you to build a house.
> Now, I buy the material for building, start work, and in time the house is completed. I offer it for sale. No one buys. Why? The house is built wrong, it will not last. Your advice then is to build another and keep on until I build a house that is salable or until I can build without making mistakes. Now, if some experienced builder should see my first house and tell me that I should have built a foundation 18 inches thick instead of only 12 inches, that the beams should be 2x8 instead of 2x6 and that the roof is wrong, then could I not on my second attempt correct these faults and have a good house on the second trial?
> The same thing applies to the writing of photoplays. I can select a plot, study the technique, write what I see on the screen and keep on plugging, but where do I arrive? Would it not be better if some experienced writer would take me and point out where I was right and where I was wrong?
> Mr. Merwin almost appeals for some one to help develop or train writers for the future, but who are the ones to do it? The editors have never offered me a suggestion, and it takes some nerve to stick to a game where there is no encouragement from anywhere with the exception of yourself, but you do not know where we are stuck. You say write. Write a hundred, write three hundred, then ask? Well, when I say I have written 30 photoplays, I do not mean that the idea came to me to write, then started in at once. Your article, "It Worked," is suitable to me. I had my sister take down in shorthand what I was seeing on the screen, we then wrote it out on the typewriter. We did not miss a movement. I had that and other "home-made" scenarios to study, and I did for 18 months; then I wrote my first and not until I was familiar with the action in general of what was necessary.

Now, if it were really the matter of building a house, which is an exact science, the writer could go to some school and study architecture. There he could find out whether twelve or eighteen inch foundations were the proper ones for a house of his size and weight. But some one had to build a lot of houses to discover that twelve-inch foundations were too slight. Many of the first houses were not built on foundations, at all, and a lot of them very probably tumbled down. Now, we know that eighteen-inch foundations are the proper width for a certain house. But even today a man cannot go out into the highway and shout out that he is going to build a house and have half a dozen other builders rush up and beg him never to build a house with twelve-inch foundations. He has to go to school and find out, and after school comes the school of experience, working for some other architect and at last the personal business success.

But here is a man who wants to announce that he is going to write plays and right away have six or eight companies send their editors to tell him all about it and sit and hold his hand when he writes. That is not the way to success. It is the direct road to failure. Get a typewriter, write stories, and learn to learn by your failures. This writer seems to have all of the mechanical helps, but he has not the willingness to study that really wins success. It is no part of the editor's job to teach the beginner. He is paid to pick out the good plays for his boss, not to educate the uneducated. It gets tiresome sometimes to hear these yawps about unhelpful editors. They are editors, not teachers, and while they help where they can, they do not help the people who are spending more time sending out S. O. S. signals than writing. Write and study and perhaps you will arrive at the point where editors will give help, but they cannot waste their time on the people who forever complain that they are not helped without doing much to prove themselves worthy of such help.

A Study System.

Reducing to brevity a late letter, the correspondent writes that each day he spends a portion of his time studying plotting, analyzing plots of produced stories, taking up clippings, etc. He also has a list of "plot points," which we imagine to be the strong points of various plots. He is a court reporter and can take down the running synopsis of plays, which he subsequently studies. He lists good and bad leaders. He has written five scripts and he has a large scrap book of clippings. He wants to know what we think of his system.

We think he is going to work without result for a long time. He will be so busy with the various points he studies that he will overelaborate his stories, or be unduly cautious. In a word he is going to work too hard. He now spends, he says, an average of fifty hours on a script and then he does not send it out. We think he is wise. We do not believe that they will sell yet.

But we do believe that some day it will dawn on this hard worker that he knows about script writing, and he'll know what he knows. He will not score the immediate success that others will gain; indeed he will be doomed to many disappointments, but some day he will find himself and then he will know all about script writing because he has studied all about it.

It is a slow process; too slow for the average man, but the writer who has the courage to persevere will eventually win and keep on winning because he has something beside accident back of him.

Just the other day an editor wrote: "If we had an opening Blank would get it. He assuredly can have the first opening there is." And Blank followed almost precisely the same thankless course of study and now he is selling seventy-five per cent. of his stuff.

There are few long distance students, but they make the lasting successes.

He's There.

This is an extract from a personal letter, and not intended for publication, but honest now, wouldn't you like to be the person this editor speaks of? Listen!

> Got a letter from ——— suggesting certain alterations in a script we bought from him a month ago and the suggestions are good. That person is interested in improving his already good work—never yells about prices, credit or warns that "authors will soon assert themselves and claim their due"—but just plugs to supply better stuff. He has ability and he's in earnest. Don't know whether he is earnest because he has ability or has ability because he's in earnest, but his way makes a hit with me and although I don't suppose it's on his mind, he's taking the very shortest route to all the good things that can come to a writer.

And in the very next mail comes a letter from the author himself asking for a little help on a knotty point. Even though he is one of the regulars now, he still has his doubts now and then, which makes this a double lesson for the man who is still fighting. The point is that he is never satisfied until he has done his best and never feels that he has done his best. In that is the entire secret of success if both assurance and diffidence are properly moderated. And note his frame of mind and note also that this editor has noted his frame of mind.

Interior Sets.

The other day we watched a director pounding out a half-reel comedy and noted that he had used eight interior sets. "It is too many," he admitted, "but they are necessary to the story," which was no excuse at all. When we have an idea that calls for too many inside sets, we make it go stand in the corner with its face to the wall until it promises to go in two or three interior settings. Don't write a story that has too many interior settings or too many inserts or too many leaders. If it is the right sort of story, it will come around and behave itself in time. You may think you must positively have a kitchen set and yet come to find out that the back doorstep will not only do as well but perhaps be better.

That is one of the first things that a beginner should learn, that no story must be written as it is first thought out. This morning we did a split that first came to us five weeks ago. It was not right, and it did not get right until a word in the morning paper the man next us was reading gave the hint that swung the story over into the "written" column.

But please remember that "set" and "scene" as used here are not synoymous. The "set" is the scenery, the physical structure. The "scene" is the action played in the set. You can have many interior scenes if you do not have many interior sets. A set may take several hours to build, a scene may take only a few minutes to rehearse and play. That's why.

Pen Names.

Before you set out to establish a pen name, provide an alibi. But before even that, make certain there is some good reason why your own name will not do. If you find a reason, then tell your bank that you have taken a pen name and when you try to cash a check made out to some one else they'll know how it is.

And if the only reason for the change is that your name is John Smith and you think Percival Maltravers will look better on the screen, don't. It will make the editors laugh a little, but it will do no other good service.

Please Don't.

"I think there should be more plays with sad endings. My reason is that they would teach a lesson. Sad endings would make people think."

This from a recent letter. Now we'll confess that there are lots of plays where the sad ending, the unhappy ending, the unpleasing, but helpful ending, would be the best. But those who advocate the "sad" ending do not care for the sad ending for their script submission. The story that ends unhappily is all right, but the trouble is that the story of the submission ends the same way. You don't get a check and the story is not made, and even the reformer likes to eat now and then, no matter how high-minded may be his purpose.

Editors know that the story that ends unpleasantly is not liked. It is his job to pick out stories that are liked. He is picking stories to please the public because the stories that please the public please the boss. If you, in your turn, will strive to please him, you are more apt to get checks, and checks are the signs of success because they show that you can write what is wanted.

We have sold lots and lots and still some more stories that have ended "and so they were married and lived happily ever after," and we were happy, too, but the sob stuff all lies in our morgue and it is likely that it will stay there. Write to please the editors. What pleases them is the sort of story that sends a man out feeling that the Gumph stories are mighty good stories. Don't try to be a long-haired reformer. Try to be a bald headed bank depositor.

The Ones Who Count.

Don't try to please your family or your friends when you write a photoplay. It is the editor who is most apt to pay you checks. Try to suit him, even if he is foolish.

Inquiries

NOTE—No inquiries can be replied to by mail. Look for your answer here. No questions can be replied to that necessitate the handling of the manuscript. Always give your name and address. It will not be published. A list of addresses, to which photoplays should be sent, will be supplied on receipt of a STAMPED AND SELF ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. The request should be made to the paper direct and not to this department, nor to the Answers Man.

J. T. M.—We have no record of a Biograph of that title.

I. H. S.—The Vitagraph winners were announced in a recent issue. There were about 300 scripts purchased or for which offers were made.

B. C.—Many scripts were held for consideration. See above. Perhaps yours is in that lot. If you have not heard, inquire of the Sun, though it was not promised that scripts unaccompanied by return covers would be sent back.

S. W.—See above, please. A close up is a scene and not part of the larger scene. That is, it is given a separate scene number.

C. R.—The question will be taken up in detail later on. All scripts are read in synopsis only, but all synopses are read. That the company asked for the action should indicate clearly that they want the action sent. Companies that announce they are not in the market may now and then purchase an occasional script, but it seldom pays to bother them.

C. T. L.—Surely use a green ribbon if you have to. The black record is merely suggestive as the best to use, not the only one that can be used.

C. A. M.—There is a good reason why an editor should hold a synopsis more than ten days. He is trying to interest some director in it, probably. A commercial film is one more than 30 days old, as a rule. A commercial subject is one made for the special use of some commercial company and not for general release. A "spot" is any location. It indicates that no particular style of background is required. It is used where wood or water would be equally available. See Technique of the Photoplay for those simple definitions, since you have the book. Unless some special costume is needed, leave the matter of dressing to the director.

L. B.—Your plot seems to be reasonably new. The title you suggest is good, though perhaps too close to "McCloskey's Stolen Symphony."

R. J. H.—Edison usually holds scripts eight to twelve weeks. We do not like prize contests. Neither do we like visions, because the directors do not like them. Do not buy shares.

A. M. K.—There is small chance for a boy as a playwriter. He has not the necessary experience in the world. At the same time it will be a good plan to start now against the time when you can write. It might be a matter of several years.

Technique of the Photoplay

(Second Edition)

By EPES W. SARGENT

Not a line reprinted from the first edition, but an entirely new and exhaustive treatise of the Photoplay in its every aspect, together with a dictionary of technical terms and several sample scripts.

One hundred and seventy-six pages of actual text.

Special chapters on Developing the "Punch," Condensing the Script, Writing the Synopsis, Multiple Reel Stories, Talking Pictures, Copyrights, etc.

In cloth, two dollars. Full leather, three dollars.

Projection Department

Conducted by F. H. RICHARDSON

Manufacturers' Notice.

IT is an established rule of the Moving Picture World and of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until such articles have been demonstrated to a member of our staff. In case of apparatus pertaining to projection this means the editor of this department.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two or three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending 4 cents, stamps (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay.

First seventy-five questions are now ready and printed in neat booklet form. They may be obtained by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy. You may be surprised at the number of questions you cannot answer without a lot of study.

Question No. 44.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Permission to use the contributor's name must accompany each answer, otherwise only the name of the city will be used. Theater managers looking for high class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

Suppose your theater used a total of 200 eight c. p. lamps on its front, 25 sixteen c. p. lamps in lobby, stairways, etc., which burned continuously, 50 sixteen c. p. lamps in the indirect lighting system, half of which burned continuously, and half turned off during the performance. In addition there were two projectors, each using 40 amperes, one dissolver using 15 amperes per lamp, and one spotlight using 12 amperes. What capacity of generator (d. c.) would you recommend, and what h. p. engine? Suppose you used a. c., and all projection current was taken through an economizer, using 60 amperes at projection machine arcs, 20 per lamp at dissolver and 20 on the spot. What, if any, difference would that make in current consumption? Suppose all projection current was taken through a mercury arc rectifier, using first named amperage on arcs, what then?

Roll of Honor.

John Mason, Toronto, Ontario, and Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas, are the only two entitled to the roll of honor, and even they just barely scratch in. The others were either entirely off, or very badly in error on one or more points.

Later: A late and correct reply to Question 38 was received from A. C. Stewart, Waitsburg, Washington. He springs a new one when he says, "If you have 110 volt current and it was changed to 220 you might get a transformer for the purpose of stepping up the voltage if it be a. c.

Reply to Question No. 38.

By John Mason, Toronto, Ont., Canada.

The question:—

Suppose you have direct current and d. c. fan and machine motors. The current supply is changed to a. c. Would it be practical to run your motors temporarily on a. c.? If you think it would, tell us how you would do it. Suppose you have 110 volt supply, and it is changed to 220, or vice versa, what would you do about your motors?

The answer:—

If the supply were changed from d. c. to a. c., and I had not been able to get a. c. motors installed, I would disconnect the leads to the brushes, removing the brushes and put a copper ring over the commutator to short circuit the armature coils. I would then connect the supply wires to the field coils, and thus run the motor as an induction motor, though it would be necessary to have a starting compensator. I would do this to all the shunt wound motors. A series wound d. c. motor might be run on a. c., providing its armature has a laminated core. The shunt wound motors I would only use temporarily, and would watch them carefully, lest they become dangerously heated. If the supply were changed from 110 to 220 I would connect two 110 volt motors in series across the 220 circuit, or place one 110 volt incandescant lamp in series with the motor. If the supply were changed from 220 to 110 I would discard the motors, as it would not be possible to make a 220 volt motor run on 110 volts without rebuilding it.

Brother Mason has overlooked one or two important points. He is correct in connecting two motors in series, providing the motors be of the same size and be pulling the same load, or, in other words, consuming the same amperage. He makes the same mistake that Brother Smith did in saying that he would connect a 110 volt incandescent lamp in series with the motor. He could only do this with a motor requiring a maximum of one-half ampere of current. Brother Smith, however, gives the following:

If I had 220 volt current and it was cut to 110 I would weaken the field of the motors, or, in case of a d. c. 220 volt motor, I would cut out one field coil if it had two. If it had four coils I would disconnect two coils, thus making a 110 volt motor.

I am not sure myself about this stunt of cutting out field coils, though I do not believe it would work. My own opinion of this whole business is that, while theoretically the transforming of a d. c. motor into an induction motor, as suggested by Brother Mason, will work; practically it won't work, because of the fact that the motor would "run its fool head off." My understanding of this matter is that the armature of a motor thus treated would instantly attain enormously high speed, and would, in fact, tear itself all to pieces. To settle this whole matter and see what's what, I refer the question to the General Electric Company, and now have a reply from one of their best technical men, which reads as follows:

Have your letter of the 7th inst., attaching copy of Question No. 38, with answer by John Mason, Toronto, Can. In general the comments which you have made on Mr. Mason's answers to the various parts of this question are correct, so there are only a few details which I can add. With regard to fan motors, d. c. fan motors are generally series wound and, therefore, theoretically, can be operated on alternating current, but it will be necessary to operate them on very much lower voltage than normal, as there would be considerable sparking at the commutator and heating in both the armature and field if operated at full 110 volts.

As regards operating a shunt wound motor as an induction motor, it is possible to arrange the motor so that it will operate this way, but, as you say, it is more a theoretical than a practical experiment.

Regarding 110 volt machines operated on 220 volts, this, of course, can be done by using resistance. Two hundred and twenty volt motors can be operated on 110 volts, but will just barely run, and will develop no power. They can be changed to 110 volt motors, but I would not recommend it be done except by an experienced electrician, familiar with this type of motor; preferably returning it to the factory, where the field coils will be connected in parallel instead of in series. It is not practical to cut out the field coils. Cutting out two field coils would change the characteristics of the motor entirely, as practically two poles would be eliminated.

As a general answer to the whole question, I should say that it would be much better in every case where changing the voltage, or changing from alternating to direct current, or vice versa, to immediately send the motors to an expert in the same city, or return them to the factory for rewinding or such changes as are necessary. Of course, in some cases it is necessary to buy new motors. I appreciate that an operator wants to do all he can to save the manager all needless expenses, but I do not consider that any man can be an expert in all branches of electrical business. Small motors are particularly designed to fulfill certain requirements, and it takes a specialist to redesign them for other requirements.

Question No. 34.

The answer to Question 34 should have appeared in July 11th issue, but for reasons stated it was held over, and the Wagner Electric Company, manufacturers of the Wagner Rotary Converter, were requested to formulate a reply to the same.

Answer to Question No. 34.

By the Wagner Electric Company, St. Louis, Mo.

The question:—

What is the action of a rotary converter when changing a.c. to d.c.? What is the direct method for starting a converter of the size and type used for moving picture work? Illustrate its connections by sketch, with explanation. Should the voltmeter connected across the d.c. side of a converter fluctuate badly and you were unable to remedy the fault, to what would you attribute it? What would be the probable cause of the trouble?

The answer:—

The rotary converter combines the motor and the generator in the one machine, with a single field and single armature winding. The motor action is that of a synchronous motor, which accounts for the fact that it must be speeded up to nearly full speed before it can run as a motor. Therefore, it must be started either as an alternating current motor or by some external means.

The Wagner single-phase converter is started as an alternating current single-phase series motor by closing a four-pole switch in the starting position for about five seconds, then quickly reversing the switch to the running position. In reversing the switch the change is made from a series motor to converter. The converter is then able to supply direct current.

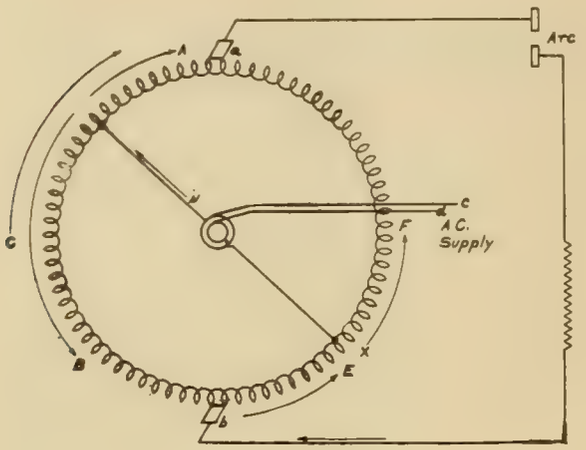

Fig. 1.

The action of the single-phase converter after it has started is as follows: In the figure, the coiled ring represents the armature winding of the converter. This winding cutting through the field magnetism produces a voltage in the direction of the arrow C. The alternating current is admitted to the armature from the slip rings shown as circles in the center of the armature. This current enters the armature in the direction of the arrow I and divides, part going in the direction of the arrow A, and part in the direction of arrow B.

That part of the current B, which goes in opposite direction to the voltage generated by the armature, produces the motor action. That part of the current, namely A, which goes in the direction of the voltage produced by the armature, produces the generator action.

The alternating current, therefore, comes in at the lead c, through the slip ring, through the lead from the slip ring to the armature in the direction of the arrow i. In the armature it divides, part going in the direction of the arrow A, and to the brush a, when it again divides, part of it flowing out through the direct-current brush a to the arc, part of it continuing on through the winding of the armature to the point X, from which it goes to the other slip ring and out through the lead D. The other part goes in the direction of the arrow B, but as it is flowing against the direction of the direct current in the brush a, it continues through the armature winding in the direction of the arrow E, and out through the slip ring and lead d. The current going in the direction of the arrow A, being in the same direction as that of the produced voltage, is generator action. That part of it that goes between the brush a and the point X on the armature, being opposite to the voltage produced on that side of the armature, is motor action. That part of the current i, is going in the direction of the arrow B, being against the direction of the produced voltage, is motor action to the point of contact of brush b, and from brush b to the point X, being in the direction of the produced voltage, is generator action.

The likelihood of inherent troubles in electrical machinery is comparatively remote, as each machine receives a thorough test at the factory before it is shipped, and as a general rule, electrical machinery will be found to be as reliable, or even more so, than any other class. Modern alternating current generators, and, in fact, all modern alternating current apparatus, is designed to have practically the same wave form. Therefore, if the modern rotary converter be run from an old type generator, whose wave form is different from that of the converter, a phenomenon known to electrical engineers as hunting will sometimes occur. This simply means that the armature of the converter will oscillate first, faster, then slower, than the normal speed. If this oscillation occurs there will be an oscillation of the voltmeter needle, which is in the direct current circuit. About the only remedy that is satisfactory in this case is to insert an inductance coil in the direct-current circuit. This will choke out practically all of the voltmeter oscillations, so that the effect cannot be noticeable on the screen. This is comparatively rare at the present time, as most of these old type alternators have found their way to the scrap pile.

Sometimes these oscillations occur, due to a very unsteady steam or gas engine driving the alternating current generator. That is, the speed of the engine varies from time to time, due to very unsteady action of the governor. In this case there is little that can be done to remove the oscillations in the direct-current circuit. Oscillations of the voltmeter in the direct-current circuit, produced by the latter cause, are not influenced by the type of converting apparatus used. They are caused by a variation of the alternating current voltage with the speed of the engine, which, in turn, affects the direct-current voltage. The connections for Wagner single-phase converter are given in Figure 2, from which any electrician can readily connect up the machine.

The description of the electrical action of the Wagner Rotary Converter is very complete and, I presume, all other rotary converters would have essentially the same electrical action. The explanation and the reason for "hunting" is particularly of value to operators, since it not only indicates the probable cause thereof, thus enabling the operator to trace out and locate at the power house, but in certain cases it indicates the remedy.

Our thanks are due the Wagner Electric Company for the trouble they have taken in compiling this excellent reply.

Mistaken Practice.

A new house, the Hanover, has just opened in Albany, New York. Its operating room equipment consists of two Power's Six A machines, taking a. c. through a choke coil. My correspondent asks: "What do you think of a manager who installs a choke coil in an operating room of an up-to-date theater? Some paradox, or rather some contradiction, is it not?"

I do not care to express an opinion as to the act of this individual manager, but I will try to point out the fact that it is a big mistake to install an ordinary choke coil in preference to a transformer or a current rectifier of some kind. I am informed that out on the Pacific coast Brother Preddy makes a choke coil which really produces satisfactory projection light. I have testimony from a number of operators to this effect, and therefore we will accept it as a fact, but, leaving Brother Preddy's device out of the argument, I am prepared to say that I have never yet seen a choke coil which I would even think of installing in an operating room of my own. They are an unsatisfactory device from the power company's point of view. They are at least no more economical than a transformer, and the quality of the light delivered by an arc controlled by a choke coil is not, in my opinion, anywhere near as excellent as the light from an arc controlled by a transformer. But why use either a choke coil or a transformer? We now have at least two satisfactory mercury arc rectifiers, and quite a number of fairly efficient and satisfactory motor generator sets, as well as one or two rotary converters which deliver acceptable results. On the face of it, judged merely by the superficial showing the transformer, or choke coil, has the best of any of the devices, because the transformer or choke coil has a very high efficiency, whereas the efficiency of a rectifying device runs from 65 to 80 per cent., which means quite a loss. This fact is, however, offset by the further fact that, in order to secure the same curtain brilliancy it is necessary to use a very much higher arc amperage with a. c. than with d. c., so that, on the whole, the actual efficiency of the choke coil, the transformer and the rectifying devices is not so very different, and, if anything, a little in favor of the rectifier, basing our calculations on screen brilliancy, which is the only true foundation to work from. But all this simply comes back to the thing which is becoming of late to be to some extent recognized, and that is when a man builds and equips an operating room it is the height of foolishness to do it without first consulting with a projection engineer whom he has reason to believe has a thorough knowledge of all these various technical points, which are, after all, intensely practical points, because they have directly to do with the final result on the screen of his theater.

Insufficient Data.

Oswald Fillmore, Harriman, Tennessee, writes:

We are having trouble with our fuses and want your help. Our equipment consists of two Power's motor-driven machines with a Fort Wayne compensarc for each projector. We also have a fan and two lights. Fuses on operating room circuit are 75 amperes and cause no trouble, but those on the transformer on the pole outside cause all kinds of difficulty. The superintendent of our light plant insists on fusing with such small fuse wire that we are having delay after delay. Am sending you a piece of the fuse, which is about 9 inches long when in a block. Do you think it is large enough to supply two machines? It melted before the first reel was run. How many amperes will solder wire carry, and would it be permissible to use the same in case of emergency? Our connections are all good.

Now here is a brother who sends in all kinds of data except the particular thing I need. If friend Fillmore is the possessor of a copy of the Handbook I would suggest that he study the electrical action of transformers and, having done so, he will come to an understanding of the fact that the number of amperes taken from the supply wires, when delivering a given amperage on the secondary, is entirely in proportion to the voltage of the supply. Yet he does not tell me what the voltage of the supply is. Without measuring I should say that the fuse wire sent is about 30 or 35 ampere capacity, and if the primary voltage is high that certainly ought to be sufficient to supply the whole theater, but if, on the other hand, the primary voltage is comparatively low, say 250, then it may be too small. You say you are using 60 amperes at each arc, or a total of 120 amperes. At 35 volts this would be 4,200 watts, or, in round numbers, 40 amperes taken from the primary of the compensarc, or, in other words, 40 amperes taken from the secondary of the pole transformer. The fuses, however, are not on the secondary, but on the primary of a pole transformer, so that if you ascertain the voltage of the supply wires and divide 4,200 by that voltage you will get approximately the amperage taken through the pole transformer fuses by your operating room arcs. If the primary voltage was 2,000, a two-ampere fuse would very nearly supply both those arcs, or, in other words, supply 120 amperes at 35 volts, or 40 amperes at 110 volts. Do you see the point? This figuring leaves out the power factor, but in a pole transformer the power factor is so high it cuts no figure, and anyhow you could not very well figure it accurately. The result, as before indicated, will only be a rough one, of course, but it will show you pretty near the size fuse needed. Don't use solder wire for fusing. Don't know its carrying capacity.

From London.

Jack H. Titford, 33 Haggeston Road, London N. E., England, writes:

These few lines are to let you know that in me you have a greatly interested reader of the department. I only wish that our "Kine" (brother Titford refers to the Kinematograph Lantern Weekly, a London publication. Ed.) would start a department similar to yours. I believe it would be a great help towards improving the condition of operators over here. I am a member of the N. A. C. O., (presumably National Association Cinematograph Operators. Ed.), our only union, and we do our best to obtain fair pay for good work, but there are so many wasters at the game that good jobs are few and far between. You see we get very little support from our trade papers. It would make things better if we had some one to stick up for us like you do for the operators in America. I may tell you that your articles on projection (published in the Kinematograph Lantern Weekly, London, last year. Ed.) interested our boys over here, and we would like some more of the same kind in our "Kine." I have been operating for more that six years, using all kinds of motors and generators, and am now taking it easy in a trade show room, running a new Ernemann of the enclosed type, and it's some machine too. Shows a picture like a rock at nine minutes a reel, with the gate runners so loose that they have only enough tension to keep the film in the gate. I believe the shape of the top loop is what keeps the picture steady with such a loose gate. I think I have taken up enough of your time, so will stop right now.

It is, of course, gratifying to know that the projection department interests operators in Merry England, and that men over there appreciate what we have been trying to do for the operator here. We would be glad to have friend Titford set forth the conditions surrounding the work in England at some length, giving some details as to construction of operating rooms, fire proofing requirements, size of observation ports, salaries of operators, hours of labor, etc., and so on. It would make mighty interesting reading for our boys over here, I am sure. I receive quite a number of letters from England, but this is the first one in quite some time which contained anything which could be used for publication. I have long since noticed that your English trade papers do not pay much attention to the improvement of projection. Ours did not do it here for quite some time.

As to another series of articles in the Kinematograph and Lantern Weekly, that can be done all right whenever the editor of that distinguished publication wants it done. However, it is somewhat difficult to handle a matter of that kind from such a long distance. I think if the English trade papers made an earnest effort they could surely find someone over there capable of taking up the work of a projection department and pushing it to a successful conclusion. Undoubtedly it would prove of vast benefit, not only to the English operators, but the business as a whole. Meanwhile, though it would involve much delay, due to the long distance and the difference in conditions. our English brothers are welcome to the department; and its editor and this paper will do anything possible to help the cousins across the sea.

A Question.

Lynn, Massachusetts, propounds the following:

I have been operating projection machines for three years, and am a member of Local 182, I. T. S. E., Boston. I would like to ask you to answer a scientific question in mechanics in which I am confident I am right. It is a question which I have never heard put. I asked fully a dozen operators at a meeting of the union, men with many years more experience than I, and they said I was wrong. I am going to put the question to you, and although at first thought you may agree with them. I want you to give it a little inside matnematical consideration. The question: If you set the outside shutter of a Power's Six A mechanism in perfect time with the teeth of the intermittent sprocket and run the film through, there will be no travel ghost, but if there is a two hole jump (piece of film cut out) in that film, I claim that if in lifting or lowering the framing device you should happen to move the film into frame with your hand on the carriage while the motive force of the intermittent sprocket is stopped, this occurring in a fraction of a second, you change the time and position of the intermittent sprocket teeth with the shutter, and that, as a result, there will be a slight, perhaps scarcely perceptible, travel ghost during the projection of the balance of that film. I refer only to Power's Six A machine. Understand that the shutter and aperture plate of that machine are in fixed relation to each other. This is confidential, if you wish it so, because the Nicholas Power Company would not care to have you admit this tiny mechanical error. I would thank you very much for the correct answer, as I want to come back at those brothers over in Boston, who all thought I was just a little bit crazy to ask and argue such a question.

There is not anything particularly confidential about this, brother. If the Nicholas Power Company had made a mechanical error, even that fact would not stop me from answering, because an error ought to be made public and corrected. However, there is no error.

I do not quite understand what you are driving at. You say if the framing is done with the hand on the carriage of the machine during the time the intermittent is on the lock. I fail to see what that would have to do with the matter, but you are right in that there is a slight change of the shutter with relation to the aperture of Power's Six or Six A machine when the carriage is framed. This change is, however, very slight, and not sufficient to be objectionable. This is due, as I understand the matter, to the fact that the toggle gear meshes on one side with a gear of small diameter (gear 677, Fig. 115, page 272 of the Handbook) and on the other side with a gear of large diameter (gear 680, Fig. 117, page 276 of the Handbook), and that, the toggle gear being moved straight up and down, there is some slight change caused in the relation of gears 677 and 680, and this, of course, makes a corresponding, slight alteration in the position of the shutter with reference to the intermittent sprocket. I think this is all the explanation that is needed, but if it is not satisfactory you are at liberty to come again.

At Last—An Architect Who Investigates.

Recently Mr. George King, an architect of Berkeley, California, was called upon to design and superintend the construction of a moving picture theater in Fresno, California. Now the average architest, (and I am sorry to say that, until Mr. King appeared on the scene, the term "average architect" included, to all intents and purposes, every architect), who has been called upon to design a moving picture theater has apparently not even had the faintest glimmering of an idea that the operating room could possibly be of any particular importance; moreover, though apparently possessed of little or no knowledge concerning the requirements of practical projection, these architects have taken absolutely no steps to inform themselves on the subject of projection and its requirements, or to consult with those who have the required knowledge, and thus, by one of these means, acquire the skill necessary to plan a really practical, efficient operating room, and locate it in the best possible manner. It is a hard, cold fact that the moving picture industry is today suffering immeasurably by reason of the futile attempts of architects to plan operating rooms without any adequate idea or knowledge of the requirements of practical projection.

Mr. King did nothing of this sort. Instead, not having a consulting projection engineer within convenient reach, he did the next best thing, and called into consultation two practical projection men, W. E. Doyle of Fresno, and a Mr. Woods, presumably W. G. Woods, San Francisco. These three gentlemen, after consulting the Handbook, combined the theoretical knowledge possessed by Mr. King, together with hints obtained from the Handbook, and the practical knowledge of Messrs. Woods and Doyle, and then they planned and located the operating room, and I venture to assert that it was properly planned and properly located.

Would that we had more architects like Mr. King. If we had we would not have $270,000 theaters with the operating room, so foolishly planned that the ceiling had to be torn out before the machines could be gotten in, and thousands of other theaters in the operating rooms of which equally ridiculous blunders have been perpetrated. My compliments to Mr. King, and may his tribe increase.

Wants to Say a Word or Two.

L. C. LaGrow, Albany, New York, writes:

With regard to W. S. James' reply to question 31, I would like to say a word or two. (Huh! that is twenty words already, Ed.) Don't think I am knocking or am not in the main satisfied with Brother James' reply, but it seems to me that he should have mentioned one very important factor which he entirely ignored, viz: the counter current generated in the armature of the motor after it has attained its speed. This counter e. m. f. acts as resistance, and, as I understand it, takes the place of outside resistance, either in series with the armature or field, after the motor has attained its normal speed. It has also built up a generation which I would like to see worked out. If I err, correct me.

As regards your last remark concerning the generation I do not know what you are driving at, brother LaGrow. If you mean the armature generates a counter e. m. f. you are, of course, perfectly correct, but this counter e. m. f. does not entirely take the place of resistance in series with field or armature in all types of motors. I hardly feel myself competent to deal fully with this matter and will ask that some of our experts on motor action comply with brother LaGrow's request, and deal with this matter fully. According to my understanding of the thing the designer of the motor carefully calculates its armature so that it will generate a certain counter e. m. f. at a given load, or, in other words, a given amperage consumption, or putting it still otherwise, at a given armature speed, but when it comes down to the finer points of this particular proposition, I do not feel sufficiently posted to deal with the matter. By-the-way, why doesn't brother LaGrow come across with a few answers himself? He used to do it. Get busy friend LaGrow, get busy!

That Automatic Dowser.

Fred R. Klink, Canton, Ohio, inventor of the automatic dowser recently described in this department, and later criticised by brother Rodgers, writes:

> In reply to D. E. Rodgers, June 13th issue, I want to say that he is to a very large degree in error. It would be impossible for the operator to forget to open the switch after the show since the little buzzer, which brother Rodgers has evidently overlooked, would instantly warn him when the circuit closed. And as to not closing the switch when starting the show, why there are lots of men who would forget to come in out of the rain unless some one told them to, therefore the switch should be located on the machine table where men of this type could not help but see it when they were threading up. I will not say that it is impossible for any substance to interfere with the operation of the dowser, but the instrument has been in actual operation for approximately a year, and in all that time it has never failed to work a single time. The Alhambra Theater, this city, has two of them on its machines, and has never had any trouble beyond the breaking of a small spring, which is negligible. As to using high resistance, I do not recommend it as there are a great many operators who do not understand the principle of it. Also in case of grounds in the lamp there would be trouble, as one side of the dowser is grounded to the frame. Everything considered, I therefore think dry batteries are best. Brother Rodgers speaks of a dowser held open by an electro magnet. There is one of this kind of a foreign make, but, so far as I know, it has never been used in this country, or anywhere else for that matter. I ran across its description in getting my patent.

All of which is respectively referred to our readers. We have already expressed our opinion on the proposition, and see no reason to change it. While the dowser is not perfect, (I don't know of anything in this vale of sorrow and tears is, for that matter) I think it is a very good device, and one which will give at least reasonable satisfaction in actual use.

England Orders the Questions.

Victor G. Brown, whose letter head bears the legend, "operator- electrician, gas, petrol and oil engines," Electra Palace, Elsecar, Yorkshire, England, encloses money order and says:

> Kindly send me, soon as possible, copy of the booklet of questions. Also can you inform me of the address of the Exhibitors' Association of New York?

There is nothing of particular interest in this letter, except that when an operator in far off England is enterprising and interested enough to get busy on these questions, certainly it ought to point a moral to operators here in the United States and Canada. The address of the Exhibitors' Association of New York is Broadway and 36th street, Hotel Marlborough. Telephone 271 Greeley.

Position of the Shutter—Travel Ghost.

From D. E. Rodgers, Manitou, Colorado, comes the following:

> Travel ghost, as seen on the screen, is of two kinds: short, well-defined and very brilliant, and long-drawn-out, and very much diffused. The former is very objectionable, and produces a decided flicker effect, something similar to having the shutter too early. When changing pictures the intermittent moves the film down. With the shutter removed, and the crank turned slowly, the picture on the screen would be seen to move up. As the machine is threaded with the picture up-side-down, and reversed right and left the light rays must cross somewhere between the film and the screen, but more of this later. Between the film and this crossing point the light ray from a point of the picture would follow the film down during the movement of the intermittent. Between this crossing point and the screen, the light follows the picture on the screen in an upward direction. If the shutter travels upward in intercepting the light, and is placed between the screen and this crossing point, it is moving in the same direction as are the light rays caused by the movement of the film, and this produces the weak, diffused travel ghost, which is not unnecessarily long because the shutter in short order overtakes the upward movement of the light caused by the downward movement of the film. Where it is not practicable to entirely dispense with travel ghost this is the kind most desirable if a smooth picture is to be obtained. We all know that it is better to have the shutter a little too "late" than a little too "early." If the shutter travels upward in intercepting the light, and is placed between the film and the crossing point of the light it is intercepting the light in an opposite direction to the movement of that light, and this produces the very brilliant, short, and well defined travel ghost, which certainly is very objectionable, and gives a bad effect on the screen. If the shutter travels upward in intercepting the light, and is placed at a distance from the objective equal to three-fourths of its focal length (measurement being made from the center of the lens barrel—not tube) the effect on the screen is about as good as can be obtained. If the shutter moves down through the light it must be closer to the lens, but I am not saying just where it should be, since my experiments were all made on a 1913 model Simplex. The above is sufficient proof that the light rays do cross in front of the objective, just as "Camden, N. J." says they do. However, lest any cynical soul be not yet firmly convinced, I offer the following indisputable proof. In making this test an up-to-date, motor driven projector, throwing a picture on a brilliant screen must be used, and, even so, it is recommended that a light weighted strap be used over the shutter shaft. The shutter is traveling "up" through the light, and is placed within one-quarter inch of the lens. A Vitagraph sub-title is on the screen. This gives us white-on-black at top, center and bottom of the screen. Carefully observe the travel ghost. At the top of the screen it is going down—the shutter is "early." At the center of the screen it is equally divided above and below. At the bottom of the screen it is all going up, and the shutter is "late." This can only be caused by shutter-travel, which is represented by the number of degrees through which the shutter travels from the time it enters the light until it has all the light cut off. A little thought will show to any operator the relation between this and the fact that the light rays cross in front of the lens. Since writing this letter it has occurred to me that some one may say that at least a part of the travel ghost may have been in the film. This is possible. However, I have repeatedly observed travel ghost as herein described, and have subjected the film to a most thorough examination, and it is not often that travel ghost is found within the film itself.

With regard to the position of the shutter and its direction of its travel as affecting travel ghost; while I have not given this matter much thought, still brother Rodgers' argument seems to hang together pretty well, so I pass it along for the consideration of the department fans. However, let me remark that "flicker" and travel ghost are two separate and distinct things, having no relation to or bearing on each ther; also the measurement spoken of would have to be from the E. F. point of the tube, not the lens jacket, in order to be of any value.

A Very Much Open-Air Show.

J. W. Myrtle, manager Beverly and Art theaters, Staunton, Virginia, writes:

> Enclosed find photograph of my outfit used to show pictures at Woodrow Wilson's home.

> The pictures were shown to the cadets of the Staunton Military, 400 in number, who were on a week's camp. The juice was made by my Detroit outfit (located near the screen) and the pictures showed up fine.

Well, brother Myrtle, that is certainly some stage setting all right. I do not think a moving picture screen ever had a more artistic background. Certainly your operating room has plenty of ventilation and ought to be thoroughly fireproof, as there seems to be nothing but the soap box to burn.

Slide Coating.

The Carter Climax Company, Brattleboro, Vermont, sends in a bottle of Carter's Climax Coating for announcement slides. There is sufficient coating in the bottle for a great many slides. It is applied with with a soft, flat brush, and the same coating may be used several times by wetting the brush with water and rubbing over the coating. It dries hard, and can be written on with a pointed instrument without flaking. For quick work this compound certainly is excellent. It can be washed off instantly with a wet cloth. Mr. Carter says he has used the coating for three years, and finds it indispensable in his work. He is, as I understand it, a practical operator, now employed at the Princess theater, Brattleboro, Vermont.

Never Too Late to Begin.

Alfred De Gregory, Brooklyn, New York, orders a set of the questions, and writes:

> I got Swoope's book from the Public Library. It is very good. Will get one of my own and a set of Hawkins' Electrical Guide soon. I might be late in starting to study, but it is never too late to begin.

Right you are brother. It is never too late to begin, and the worst enemy to himself is that man who thinks otherwise.

Shocking Discussion.

Some weeks ago I published a letter from Seattle, Washington, with regard to the effect of placing the rheostat on the positive or negative of a d. c. circuit. My comments on this letter have moved Seattle to come back with the following:

> Concerning the shock question, with the resistance on the negative wire: "shock" is the result of a short being formed through the human body, or part thereof, and its intensity depends principally on the voltage, but the seriousness of any resulting burn depends upon the amperage passing through the short. Current carrying contact from a circuit whose voltage is just enough to overcome the resistance of the body, but through which a very high amperage flowed, would cause little or no perceptible shock, though a serious burn might result while, high voltage and low amperage would cause a serious shock but no burn. In a moving picture projection arc circuit there are three places to get a shock: (a) behind the rheostat, where the potential difference is usually 110 volts or 220; (b) around the rheostat, where the potential difference is about 65 volts, and (c) across the arc, where the potential difference is about 48. Admitting that the location of the rheostat makes no difference on the arc voltage, which your own experience proves to be the fact, regardless of the reason, then the intensity of the shock explains itself, since the only shock you can get in the lamp house is from the arc voltage, or from the potential difference between the upper and lower carbon. And now let us go back to our water analogy. The intake pressure would make no difference in the speed of the wheel or in the power exerted by the wheel, provided the tail race pressure was sufficiently high by reason of stopping down its outlet, and thus limiting the quantity of water. In the lamp house we have the same condition. You might conceive of a condition where the potential difference between the positive wire and the ground was 1,000 volts, and between the negative and the ground 950 volts, and the lamp would burn the same as though it was on a 50-volt circuit, and no more additional insulation would be necessary in the carbon arms, but the insulation between the wires and carbon arms, and the lamp house and ground would necessarily be sufficient to withstand 1,000 volts pressure.

I am obliged to take exception to your last remark. You say that "I might conceive of a condition where the potential difference between the positive wire and the ground is 1,000 volts, and between the negative and the ground 950 volts, and that the lamp would burn the same as though it was on a 50-volt circuit, and no more insulation would be necessary in the carbon arms."

If I understand you correctly you are entirely wrong, by reason of the fact that there is no potential difference between a wire and the ground—none whatever, except in so far as the ground offers a current-carrying path to the other wire; therefore the only potential difference possible would be between the two wires. The ground has nothing whatever to do with the matter. It is simply offering a path from one wire to the other. I won't go further into this maatter just now, because perhaps I have misunderstood your meaning. You are quite correct in your statement that it is the voltage which causes what we term shock and the amperage which produces the burn. Of course, as a matter of fact, this discussion from one point of view is of no particular practical value, but nevertheless anything that tends to give us a better understanding of electrical language is of value, and of direct value, too. You may be correct in your explanation of the main question. The thing sounds plausible.

Incidentally here is a question for operators: Which would produce the heaviest shock and have a greater tendency to produce burn, touching the two binding posts of the rheostat, or the two carbon arms of the lamp?

"Act the Part; Your Salary Depends on It."

The above is the subject of a card put out by one Snyder, who deals in lids, straw, felt, plug and otherwise, for the human cranium. There is a world of thought contained in that little sentence, act the part; your salary depends on it, and sure enough your salary does depend on it. If you act like a rummy, and place shadows on the screen instead of a clear, white brilliant light; if you act the lazy part and gawk out of the front window when you should be watching your picture; if you keep your machines dirty, oily or greasy; if you point the oil can at the projector and squirt oil indiscriminately all over it, instead of carefully putting one drop on each bearing, and, in consequence, your film gets all covered with oil; if you polish your lenses once a week, instead of every day; if you throw your tools down on the floor, or in a heap on a table, instead of putting them neatly in order; if you have a dirty, littered up operating room instead of a clean, neat one; if you are dirty and slovenly in your personal appearance instead of neat and clean; if you talk like an East Side tough, instead of like a gentleman, then you are not "acting the part," and you need not hope to mount to the top of the ladder of financial success in your calling.

It is very true that even when you "act the part," recognition of that fact is slower than it should be, but if you do act the part, and continue to act the part, either you are enormously unlucky, or the time will come when, at least to a considerable extent, the result will be recognized in your pay envelope, and, moreover, aside from any financial consideration, you will have that self-respect which the careless, slovenly workman never has, and cannot possibly have, and that feeling alone is worth a whole lot to any man. Act the part, gentlemen! If your salary does not actually depend on it, at least it is very largely influenced by it.

Locating the E. F.

Roy A. Goggin, Estherville, Iowa, writes:

> On page 1685, June 20th issue, I notice you tell Chicago to measure the exact distance between the two combinations of his objective and make a file mark on the barrel, and that will be the point of e. f. According to my idea the e. f. is not always half way between the two combinations. It might be if the two combinations were exactly alike, but, as a matter of fact, the front and rear combinations are different, so their focus will be also different; at least that is the way with photographic lenses. My method of locating the e. f. of the lens is to remove the back combination and get the b. f. of the front combination in the usual way; also get the b. f. of the back combination forward; that is to say, turn it around so that the bulge is forward, the same as the front set is, and take the point backward from the front set and the point forward from the black set and the distance will be the e. f. I suppose brother James and Professor Wall will sit down on me, but I live out here near Missouri, and will have to be shown that I am wrong. In writing of your trip you say your motorcycle snaked five hundred pounds through the Berkshire Hills. Does that include the weight of the machine, or only the load that was on the motorcycle? In the former instance, allowing 350 pounds for the motorcycle, which is about what they weigh, that would allow 150 for you and Mrs. R., not counting in the heavy grip. Therefore, for heaven's sake, how much do you and Mrs. R. weigh respectively? Please explain for my wife's benefit as she is the one who brought the question up.

Well, taking your own figures and allowing 75 pounds for the grip, I would weigh 110 lbs. less than nothing. However, the weight of the go-devil was not included, so that poor motor really pulled fully 800 pounds. As to "showing you," why I will proceed to try and do it, brother Out-near-Missouri. You say, take the point backward from the front set and the point forward from the back set, and the distance will be the equivalent focus. Now, according to my poor, weak, feeble mind that does not really mean much of anything. If you mean that you add the two together and the result is the point of e. f. I cannot agree with you, since by that method it would be impossible to locate the point of e. f. on the lens barrel at all, as the e. f. would be longer than the aforesaid barrel. If you mean that the b. f. of one will just meet the b. f. of the other, why use both to locate the mark? I think, friend Goggin, you slipped a cog or two, and are entitled to come again with a more lucid explanation of your idea.

Transparent Ink.

The Trânspero Fluid Company, Chicago, Illinois, sent in sample bottles of their Transpero Slide Ink. It comes in red, blue and green. This ink is used to write directly on glass, after having first cleaned the glass thoroughly, of course. It writes without spreading, and is clear and beautifully colored. Unquestionably the transpero ink will deliver the goods in the matter of writing slides on raw glass without any special preparation. It can therefore be recommended to those who have occasion to do that kind of work.

Machine Trouble.

Robert C. Harrell, Prescott, Arkansas, writes:

> Am having trouble with my Power's machine. The machine itself sets steady and the picture is steady, but there is vibration in the mechanism, and the framing device, unless it is set very tight, continually works down, thus throwing the picture out of frame. We are using sixty day films. Could the stiffness of these films cause the trouble? Please help me out as I am getting a little nervous.

Frankly, brother Harrell, I cannot figure out what is wrong with your machine. If you have described things correctly there is nothing I can see that would cause the trouble. However, I am referring your complaint to the manufacturer and will ask him to correspond with you direct. It may be necessary to send your mechanism in to the factory.

The Albany Union.

The Albany Operators' Union is endeavoring by every means in its power to improve the working conditions and raise the salaries of Albany operators. It is to be hoped that in the near future Albany will have an adequate examination, and it is also to be hoped that the examination really be adequate, because a farcical one is worse than none at all.

Boston Local.

We are informed that Boston M. P. M. O. Local Union No. 182 has accepted the proposition of the Exhibitors' League and signed a three-year contract. The Exhibitors' League covers practically all the houses in Boston and the eastern part of Massachusetts. We are not fully informed as to how satisfactory the agreement is, but suppose it is at least fairly so, or the Boston boys would not have stood for it.

Comments on the Films

Licensed.

A BADGER HUNT (Pathe), July 21.—On the same reel with "Life in Japan." Dogs trail a badger to its den, where there is an interesting fight which continues on land and water, the animal being captured by human aid.

LIFE IN JAPAN (Pathe), July 21.—On the same reel with "A Badger Hunt." Showing some very interesting scenes and customs of the "Flowery Land."

TEMPER AND TEMPERATURE (Lubin), July 21.—On the same reel with "Worms Will Turn." This is a mother-in-law comedy written by E. P. Sargent. There are many funny scenes which received much laughter.

WORMS WILL TURN (Lubin), July 21.—On the same reel with "Temper and Temperature." This is one of those plots wherein policemen and tramps come into conflict, and chase after chase predominate. It is very hilarious in action and received a great many laughs.

THE LURE OF THE LADIES (Selig), July 21.—The plot of this comedy photoplay is made up of a good many foolish things indulged in by a society man, who has nothing else to do but to get into trouble, which he accomplishes in an alarming manner. In spots it gains some laughs.

THE BEAST (Kalem), July 21.—This offering is very melodramatic in nature. It is well photographed and the direction is meritorious, in an artistic sense, but, taking all in all, it is not very pleasant to view. Alice Joyce is the feature and does her usual good work and the acting of all the others in the cast is well done. The denouement is quite a surprise.

A MATTER OF MINUTES (Edison), July 21.—This is the eighth of "The Man Who Disappeared" series, written by Richard Washburn Child and produced by Charles J. Brabin, Marc MacDermott, Miriam Nesbitt and Barry O'Moore have the principal parts. There are the usual melodramatic incidents. An exciting areoplane race with an express train is shown. This is an absorbing number of the series.

MRS. BILLINGTON'S FIRST CASE (Essanay), July 21.—In the plot of this photoplay there is a conflict between a husband and his wife, which develops considerable interest. The wife has studied law and received a diploma for practice. Her husband is also an attorney and in her first case she finds that she comes into opposition with him. With the aid of the district attorney, who is an intimate friend, they eventually convince her that a woman's place is at home; marital happiness reigns supreme.

THE FABLE OF THE HIGHER EDUCATION THAT WAS TOO HIGH FOR THE OLD MAN (Essanay), July 22.—A collection of college pranks give life and fun to this picture which is quite laughable. The fable is not impressive and the picture would have been much better if it could have been made in some college team just after some athletic victory. Then it would have been convincing. A very fair offering.

THE SEALED PACKAGE (Selig), July 22.—A melodrama not strongly constructed and in which the end can be foreseen too soon. There is no villain in it; but the older clerk is fired at the close most unjustly to make him seem villainous—he ought to have planned to get his fellow-clerk into trouble and it could have been easily done by making him willfully place the sealed package in the grip of the traveling salesman. Again, if the salesman had been shown as in great need of money that would have kept the end in doubt longer. A rather weak offering.

BUDDY'S DOWNFALL (Vitagraph), July 22.—Buddy, about fifteen, has a girl, but another maid comes to town and Buddy would rather take her to the church festival. Big brother sees to it that he comes to grief, howbeit in no very convincing way; but the pain is only temporary, for Mother sees to it that he has a good time after all. There are many good bits of comic character-drawing in it and it will amuse pretty well.

A DEAL IN STATUARY (Edison), July 22.—There is only one bit of wit in this slight offering by Richard Neill and put on by Charles Seay. The fight of the two fake statues (the janitor and the valet) as finished product, posed by the impecunious sculptor to get $10,000 from his aunt, made a laugh. It is broad and there is very little to it.

HIS WIFE'S BURGLAR (Edison), July 22.—On the same reel is this, also a rather slight offering of farcical nature, written by R. Koehler and produced by Charles Seay. Jessie Stevens and Dan Mason help it out; but the only real fun in it is at the very end—that is laughable.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 42.—Close views of General Villa and his Mexican advisors are found in this number, which also contains many other features of interest.

THE APPLE, OR, MAKING ROSA STYLISH (Vitagraph), July 23.—The story of two young immigrants who come to America, presumably from Italy, though the character makeups are not entirely clear. Hugo thinks Rosa is not so stylish as the new girl who has attracted him, but her aunt evolves a scheme which transforms the girl into a beauty and wins back her lover. The story is pretty and entertaining and the photography very attractive throughout.

THE CHEESEVILLE COPS (Biograph), July 23.—This is a half-reel burlesque, featuring a company of eccentric police. The action of the piece centers about a parade, apparently taken during a Fourth of July celebration. Two crooks steal a watch from Major U. R. A. Stiff, and the deposed police inspector captures them and wins the girl. This is well pictured and contains a moderate amount of amusement.

THE SHOW BUSTERS (Biograph), July 23.—On same reel with above. The stranded show troupe take the places of some amateur actors and are driven out of the theater with a hose. The photography is good and this gets numerous laughs, particularly in the closing scenes.

SLIPPERY SLIM'S INHERITANCE (Essanay), July 23.—A good ranch comedy number, in which Slim is advised that he has inherited a fortune. Sophie weds him when he is supposed to be dying, intending later to marry Mustang Pete. But Slim recovers and holds her to the contract, though the fortune fails to materialize. This works up gradually to quite an amusing climax.

THE WINNING TRICK (Vitagraph), July 24.—A comedy number, with Lillian Walker and Arthur Ashley in the leads. She plays the part of a romantic girl who insists on marrying a poor man. He conspires with her father and pretends to lose his wealth; later Lillian is glad to learn they are not poor. This makes good light amusement and is altogether a pleasing offering. The photography is excellent.

THE SUBSTITUTE HEIR (Selig), July 24.—This yarn, by Roy L. McCardell, proves a very pleasing one. The widow of the deceased millionaire tries to defeat the nephew and rightful heir by claiming she has a child. But the colored maid substitutes a black baby. The closing scenes in this prove laughable and it makes a good comedy offering.

A TRAITOR TO HIS COUNTRY (Lubin), July 24.—A Filipino story, written by Will M. Ritchey. The hero, if he could be so termed, betrayed his country to save the life of his sweetheart. The situation is quite an interesting one. The characters do not many of them look the part of natives, but the settings are suggestive of the Philippines. This does not work up the suspense that was possible, but it makes an entertaining story.

THE BINGVILLE FIRE DEPARTMENT (Kalem), July 24.—An eccentric comedy number, in which the chiefs of the fire and police departments love the mayor's daughter. The fun in this is of the slapstick sort, quite amusing in its way, but perhaps discounted somewhat by innumerable offerings of the same type that have gone before. These situations are none of them extremely new.

THE LITTLE WIDOW (Biograph), July 25.—A slight plot with little suspense keeps this picture from really getting hold of the spectator. One will like the acting and the characters; but in the tale itself he will see only material that has been done before and so often that he will at once feel that the outcome is to be according to precedent.

THE LAST ASSIGNMENT, TWELFTH OF THE DOLLY SERIES (Edison), July 25.—Dolly accepts the heart and hand of the Comet's managing editor. It is a simple slight love story with much of the quality of the others of the series and furnishes fair entertainment. The acting is high-grade and so the incident is made convincing.

BRONCHO BILLY AND THE GAMBLER (Essanay), July 25.—Broncho Billy pictures are still popular with audiences. This is a fairly good specimen of them. It has action, is well built and holds attention. The acting is as always, convincing for the most part, and the photography is fair—now clear and now a bit thick.

FOOTPRINTS (Selig), July 25.—A somnambulism story with a rather unconvincing train of evidence, throwing suspicion of the theft of diamonds on the fiancee of the son of the house. It is proved that the footprints of the man's mother are the exact size as those of the fiancee and she never knows that anyone had suspected her of taking the string of gems. It is too improbable to be wholly entertaining, but has some good scenes.

DEFYING THE CHIEF (Kalem), July 25.—An Indian story with interesting action. It is fresh and has a quality that makes it seem very plausible. We commend it as a good offering, naturally acted and cleverly photographed.

A MATTER OF RECORD (Lubin), July 25.—A fresh idea gives life to this acceptable little comedy written by Emmett Cambell Hall and put on by Harry Myers. The joke lies in what the office phonograph reported to wifey. Her worthy spouse was henpecked and it came to him one day that he could have wifey call up the office any evening and that his voice through the phonograph would answer. It did so and to his great satisfaction one of was but he was not aware that his pesky contraption overheard him talking to his stenographer, and so the next evening it reported it all to wifey. Well, there was trouble for the man, but the spectators liked it.

Licensed Specials.

BREAD UPON THE WATERS (Vitagraph), July 21. Special feature in two parts. Written by William Addison Lathrop and directed by Wilfrid North. The plot of this photoplay illustrates how sacrifices made for others return a thousandfold, and eventually bring fame and fortune to a struggling artist. Etienne Girardot does splendid work as Jean. Lillian Walker was enticing as Mary, and Audrey Berry and Jacqueline Brown as Laura and Toodles, two little girls, are clever little actresses. A most worthy offering.

WHO SEEKS REVENGE (Lubin), July 22.—A two-part melodrama thoroughly commercial in that it is made up wholly of the "good old things" that are always sure of a fair approval by the majority. The story follows the plan of villainy frustrate and love triumphant. It opens at an army post in the Indian days in the West and closes in the East after a sweatshop fire in which the real villain dies. It is clearly photographed, is full of incidents, some of them very convincing, and is always understandable. Emmett Campbell Hall is the author and Joseph Smiley put it on.

THE RIVAL RAILROAD'S PLOT (Kalem), July 22.—A two-reel railroad picture, full of dandy scenes and pictures of locomotives belching the blackest of black smoke. These stirring scenes and its good photography make it a very entertaining offering in spite of the weakness of the story. We doubt whether a rival railroad could hire a stable sweeper to act as fireman on the locomotive that was to race for a mail contract and have him dope the water-tank so that the engine would "prime"; but it seems all right in a picture. That that same stable boy would, without special orders, overstep this when his plan had gone awry and pull a pistol at the rival engineer is hardly convincing enough for a picture. There is also a very weak, conventional scene in the train dispatcher's office that most will think unconvincing. These bits of slipshod work hurt the picture without anywhere near killing it. E. W. Matlack is author and J. P. McGowan put it on.

THE FALSE SHADOW (Lubin), July 23.—A strong production in two reels, written by Frank Howard Clark. This concerns a young artist who submits to a eugenic examination before marriage. The villainous doctor says his blood is infected and he is unfit to wed. The artist becomes an outcast and is only saved from utter degradation by the doctor's confession. The plot is original and convincingly worked out. The fire scenes toward the close were startlingly vivid and, as a whole, this production is a superior one, though the doctor's crime was truly a diabolical one. John Ince, Vilette Stringer, Robert Whittier and George Trimble play the leads very acceptably. A good offering.

WHY PREACHERS LEAVE HOME (Melies), July 23.—This offering devotes two entire reels to depicting a commonplace plot. The idea of the preacher and a traveling whiskey salesman getting mixed up has been used before and the action here is not fresh enough in incident to hold the attention. This could have been told very easily in one reel, and even then it would not have been very successful.

LADDIE (Edison), July 24.—A new version of this well-known two-reel success. It is one of the simplest and most appealing photoplays ever made. The boy grows up and goes to the city, where his aged mother follows for a visit, after fifteen years. He is a little ashamed of her old-fashioned ways and neglects her. Margaret McWade was very strong in the mother part and Ben. F. Wilson was pleasing as the grown-up Laddie. This brought tears to the eyes of the audience and tells a story that will no doubt continue its previous popularity.

A LETTER FROM HOME (Essanay), July 24.—A two-reel offering from a story by Edward Boltwood, in which Richard C. Travers plays the part of State's Attorney "Honest Jack" Armory. Gerda Holmes is the wife, who gives up her longing to move back West when she learns that her husband is considering selling out to the land thieves on her account. This has a strong close, though the characters were very slow in developing a definite interest. The opening scenes seemed vague and purposeless, but were later helped out by the dialogue inserted as subtitles. This is an offering of about average merit.

ROMANTIC JOSIE (Vitagraph), July 25.—A two-reel comedy that we dare not commend as a sure offering of entertainment. Most of it seems dead and, though there are a few laughs and parts that are fairly amusing, as a whole, it is wholly lacking in real vigor.

Independent.

THE BAHAMAN PINEAPPLE PLANTATION (Princess), July 24.—A clearly photographed topical full of interest. It shows the whole process of growing and marketing pineapples.

HARVESTING ICE (Princess), July 24.—On the reel with the foregoing, this jumps from summer on a tropic isle to winter in New York and it, too, is clearly pictured. These instructive topicals should prove acceptable.

FROM WASH TO WASHINGTON (Thanhouser), July 26.—A beautiful travelogue of the Capitol City in which, in a dream, a washer-girl (Margarite Snow) dreams that she and her sweatheart (James Cruze) take a "flying" trip to Washington. They just jump about from here to there in the city and we see the sights that they are looking at. It ought to make a good offering. The photography is perfect.

LEAVE IT TO SMILEY (Komic), July 26.—A laugh-maker that is a sure guess for exhibitors. The theatrical company has gone broke and two of the players decide to get out. How they get along on their wits make [illegible] irresistible fun. Well acted and [illegible] offering.

A WILD RIDE (Sterling), July 27.—This film story is enacted by children. The boy rivals strive over their lady love at a beach resort, the wild ride being taken on a [illegible] railway. In the [illegible] sued by a burlesque police force. Not much plot to [illegible] fairly amusing.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, NO. 28 (Reliance), July 27. [illegible] West End cottages at the seashore of New Jersey make the background of this installment and are clearly photographed and interesting. The story continues on its new tack smoothly and with enough interest to satisfy.

TROUBLESOME PETS (Sterling), July 30.—The master of the house, tired of the monkey and parrot, kept by his wife, puts one in the pantry and the other down the well. The parrot's cries for help rouse the neighborhood. There are no extremely laughable places in this, but it is lightly amusing throughout.

BILL SQUARES IT WITH THE BOSS (Komic), Aug. 2.—A comedy that will make friends for the exhibitor. Bill (Tammany Young), the boss (Tod Browning), and the stenographer (Fay Tincher) are all so funny that they only need to have a chance to make a good laugh. Then there is in the situation a spontaneous fun that is wholly contagious and it makes one of those thoroughly delightful offerings that are certain money-getters for all who exploit them. A dandy offering.

THE MIND'S AWAKENING (Frontier), Aug. 2.—This Western offering has quite an entertaining plot. The new waitress finds both her husband and her father at the hotel and the reunion follows a night encounter with some would-be thieves. Dolly Larkin and Arthur Allardt play the lovers. Not handled very strongly but contains good plot material.

BEHIND THE VEIL (Rex), Aug. 2.—A story by Lois Weber effectively appealing to kindly human sentiments and staged by the Smalleys, with their usual skill. The man and his wife (Phillips Smalley as the man and Lois Webber as the woman) have been separated and the child, an important character in the plot, is with the father. There appears in the village a woman who always wears a veil and the neighbors wonder. It is the mother who comes to be near her child and the denouement which is convincingly worked up, too, brings about the satisfactory reconciliation between the separated pair. It is a good picture, clearly acted and human. The photography is excellent. We commend it.

IN DAYS OF OLD (Eclair), Aug. 2.—A picture played almost exclusively by children and with a story that is given as a dream. Its villain is a medieval potentate who falls in love with the wife of one of his lords. The jealous queen kills the lady by poison roses; but it is only a pretended death and enables the husband to rescue her from the wicked court. It is a very pretty offering, charmingly costumed and set; but is commendable most for its novelty.

THE STORM BIRD (Powers), Aug. 4.—A sea story, with Edna Maison and Ray Gallegher as the lovers. The principal action centers about the young mate's row with the captain on board the vessel. The small boy and the girl come to his rescue. This is about an average offering.

SOME COP (Crystal), Aug. 4.—Charles De Forrest and Vivian Prescott play the leads in this rough farcical offering. It is not very funny on account of lack of spontaneity more than anything else and it is a bit vulgar.

MAGGIE'S HONEST LOVER (Nestor), Aug. 4.—A rough-and-tumble farce with the partly constructed buildings of the San Diego Exposition as background. The burlesque characters are workmen on the construction job and the heroine is the daughter of the sand-pile man. The foreman is the villain and a subtitle lets us into the secret of his being a "dirty scoundrel." Maggie's honest lover, the carpenter, can look innocent after throwing a brick. It ends with a chase and will please.

THE THIRD PARTY (Joker), Aug. 5.—Husband is jealous of his wife's brother whom he has never seen, so he makes the butler dress in one of his wife's gowns and then she is jealous. To tell the truth, there is very little left to this particular situation; but the players in this case have done all that they could by clever acting and have succeeded in putting some comic atmosphere in it.

SYMPHONY OF SOULS (Rex), Aug. 6.—Not very dramatic or effective, because the story is neither sensational or inevitable and the love between the blind girl and the music-master, who has taken her and cared for her when orphaned, does not powerfully convince. We feel too sure that he is going to give her up to her grandfather in the end. It is a fair offering, not a big or noteworthy one. The photography is clean.

THE MAN OF HER CHOICE (Powers), Aug. 7.—A rather weak picture. The story might have been suggested by "Admirable Crichton"; but it has been, it seems, hurriedly thrown together and the relationships of the characters does not convince. There is too much unimportant business that shows nothing new to us and this makes it dry. In the best scenes the photography is fair.

THAT'S FAIR ENOUGH (Joker), Aug. 8.—A burlesque containing much rough stuff that will entertain the large number of those who like this sort of thing.

A MIDNIGHT VISITOR (Rex), Aug. 8.—A cleverly thought up offering that will give good entertainment. The rather gay and festive husband would go to the club. There, after drinking a bit too much, he sleeps and dreams of a burglar who scares his wife to death. He falls off the chair and, on reaching home, finds that there has been visitor; but that it was the stork and not a yeggman. This has been pictured in such a way as to bring out a sure laugh when the true inwardness of the situation revealed to us. We can count it a very good offering.

ALL AT SEA (Nestor), Aug. 8.—A comical sea-side romance, taken at Coronado Beach and then on shipboard, and full of beautifully photographed scenes. There was a good deal of laughter while it was on, chiefly because of the spirited acting, and it makes a very fair offering.

Independent Specials.

SHORTY AND THE ARIDVILLE TERROR (Broncho), July 22.—A two-reel farce that is pretty sure to be counted good entertainment. It has an amusing plot, but there is much rough action included and this gives it a broad appeal and makes it a safe offering. The wife of the frontier village's dentist has a way of coaxing into the office cowpunchers with perfectly good teeth and getting a fee out of them. The "Terror" comes to town and is put on to the "good thing." He, himself, has some misgivings, but perseveres until the dentist and his wife get him under gas. But when he comes out of it he wrecks the office, and there follows a typical chase with tumbles, shooting and many other diverting actions.

THE MILLION-DOLLAR MYSTERY NO. 6 (Thanhouser), July 20.—This reviewer had not seen the former installments of this picture and comments on it as a spectator in the same predicament. What he sees going on is indeed a mystery; but he doesn't know whether it is so intended or not, nor at first does he know to which side is to give his allegiance, nor who is the heroine and who the villainess. He sees much that keeps him interested. For example, he sees the box" thrown overboard and sink to the bottom of the sea where it disturbs the sand and sea-weeds. It is all perfectly photographed and the players are natural and act skillfully.

THE MYSTERY OF THE HINDOO IMAGE (Majestic), July 26.—A good, exciting detective story in two parts. A man is found dead in his library, killed by the knife of his ward, who the day before had been abusive to him. His fingers still hold the head of the Hindoo image. The ward is convicted, but while the detective is working on the case he escapes. The detective has a stirring adventure in the apartment of a Hindoo swamii whom he proves to be the culprit. But before this is accomplished, the ward is recognized and again brought to a cell. There's a shiver-making snake scene in it and the plot is constructed to hold interest well. Acting and camera work are good. An excellent offering.

THE MILLION-DOLLAR MYSTERY, NO. 7 (Thanhouser), July 27.—"The Doom of the Auto Bandits" is the special title this week and the two reels give us a self-contained and exciting episode. This reviewer has not seen the first three numbers of this picture and has not got it, as a whole, quite clear from seeing the last four (this is the seventh installment). He can understand the episode and found enjoyment as well as suspense in it; but who the characters are he doesn't yet know.

THE MESSENGER OF DEATH (Thanhouser), July 28.—A two-reel picture of the Indian frontiers in which hill people attack a compound left in the care of a sergeant (Irving Cummings) with a handful of men and the sister of the captain to the guard. There is very little dramatic action in it, hardly enough to fill out one reel, and the ending is tragic without the deep significance that makes tragedy worth while. A weak offering.

THE MADMAN'S WARD (Victor), July 31.—This two-reel subject features Florence Lawrence. Others in the cast are Charles Craig, John C. Brownell and William O'Neill. The chief interest in this picture centers in the star, who is seen in one of her favorite roles of a young and carefree girl brought up by the madman, and also in the fine ocean-shore backgrounds. There are good situations in the second reel.

A MAN AND HIS BROTHER (Victor), Aug. —.—This two-reel subject, in which Warren Kerrigan plays the lead, holds all the way with the exception of the last one or two scenes, which are weakened by an unmoral ending. It shows Mr. Kerrigan in a typical Western role, formerly so familiar to his followers.

FIRELIGHT (Eclair), Aug. 5.—A two-part picture of sentiment in which a man, who is making his millions every year and grinding down everyone he comes in contact with, has a fierce strike on his hands. His wife, who seems very tearful, knows that one of his striking workers is waiting to shoot him. She detains him with stories of their youth, courting and married life. These include some very pretty scenes and result not only in saving the man from being shot, but in giving him a change of heart. It is well photographed and will make a good offering.

RESCUED BY WIRELESS (Bison), Aug. 7.—This two-reel number, produced by Henry McRae in Honolulu, is a combination of story and scenic novelties. The story halts while we look at tapestry being made from bark, pineapples growing, rice fields, water buffalo and the like. This being disposed of, the story moves ahead and stirs up quite a lot of excitement in the second reel. William Clifford, Sherman Bainbridge and Marie Walcamp play the leading parts. This holds the interest in spite of its faulty construction from the story standpoint.

THE RAT (Box Office Attractions).—A two-reel story of the underworld, chiefly remarkable for its close attention to settings and character details. It has the further recommendation of dealing with low life in a manner which at no time proves depressing, as it calls out the better traits of the gang members. Henry King plays the part of the "Rat," who comes to the aid of Marian, the millionaire's daughter, when she has been abducted. This is one of the best offerings of this type we have seen and is played by a well-balanced cast.

THE HUNCHBACK OF CEDAR LODGE (Box Office Attraction).—A three-reel balboa ghost story, set in old Virginia and with a romance woven into it. It will entertain and please without exciting any special admiration, excepting the stage-craft of the haunted library scenes with the hidden treasure chamber behind the walls and secret panel. We have seen much cleverer camera work than that in the picture of a storm in this offering. The hunchback villain kills his father and gets his brother suspected (both love the same girl); but years later this brother finds his skelton stretched across the hidden trunk of gold and gems in the secret closet, and this is a very effective close to a series of good scenes. Some of Balboa stories are of the best; but, as in this case, original stagecraft and camera work give a popular and entertaining quality to even its commonplace and commercial stories.

OLE BRANDEIS' EYES (Box Office Attractions).—A four-reel Bioscope picture taken along some beautiful mountain lake, like Como, with tremendous backgrounds and lovely bits of landscape; ilex trees, garden walks, marble steps and the rough twists and bends of a hillside city's ways. Hans Ewer's novel furnished the scriptwright with his story which is half mystical and deals with an artist, Ole Brandeis, who gets the faculty of seeing people as they truly are. The spectator, after seeing one or two transformations, begins to speculate on how this or that other character in it is going to turn out. The gallery will hardly understand the meaning of it all, but it will be an entertaining exercise to instructed patrons. There is a ragged heroine who alone is good and true, and what she appears to be, and the rich artist finds this out. A good offering for the right place; but one that we fear that the general spectator will not be enthusiastic over. It is well acted and the backgrounds are artistically photographed. Its double-exposures are poorly matched.

THE TOLL OF THE WAR-PATH (Warner's Features).—A three-part Albuquerque picture of early Western days which has a loss of memory incident and a heroine who finds herself innocently with two husbands. In the first reel the story engages our attention easily and holds steadily throughout. Its heroine (Dot Farley) is pretty and vivacious and makes a very acceptable cow-girl with her easy and graceful riding. There is plenty of Indian fighting and battle smoke, and sufficient action to get past with the audiences as a good offering. Yet it has no special strength.

HOW JOHANNA SAVED THE HOME (Warner's Features).—On the same reel and used as a filler to close the last part is this comical laugh-maker by Dot Farley. It is slight, but acceptable, and being a comic Indian picture, goes well with the foregoing.

THE LEGACY (Warner's Features).—A three-reel detective story, made in France. It is fairly interesting as a story, although if it had been cut down to about two reels of film we would have had a more clear-cut and snappy picture without losing a thing of the story. The little heroine is stolen by her evil brother whom the grandfather has cut off from his inheritance and this is done to force the mother to give him a part of the money. It has some unusual scenes in the last reel showing a mine where the youth and his gang take the little sister to hide her and to which the great detective follows. The photography is clear and the story makes a very fair feature offering; but without special strength.

THE HUMAN SOUL (Box Office Attractions).—A three-part Balboa offering with a most unusual theme and with one scene that is truly startling. There are two distinct stories, neither of which is convincing. In the first, where the man photographs the raising soul of his dying wife, there is no heart appeal except momentary emotion, due to good acting. The second is wholly commonplace except that the finding of the photograph years afterward by the man's daughter, which keeps her from running away with a worthless scoundrel, is merely a new incident. Both the stories are trashy, yet they interest, partly due to flashes of good acting, but most to the clever camera work. As a whole, the picture has enough life to please and will be liked. It is a safe offering, not a great one.

LASKY TO MAKE "HEART OF MARYLAND."

The first of the Belasco plays to be put into motion pictures will be "The Heart of Maryland," according to a decision reached by David Belasco and Jesse L. Lasky. The scenario has been arranged by Mr. Belasco and turned over to the Lasky Company, which will make the production. The company will be sent into Southern Maryland, where the scenes of the play are laid. Starting at Frederick, the company will traverse the famous Shenandoah Valley and Braddock's road, which runs through Cumberland, west, along which the Army of the Potomac marched.

Several scenes will be laid at Harpers Ferry, Greene Springs, W. Va., and along the Potomac River, through Maryland to Piedmont, W. Va. There will be 300 players in the cast, and the picture will be 5,000 feet in length.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY IN NORTH CAROLINA.

At Bat Cave, N. C., Ned Finley, the Vitagraph director, has pitched camp in a tent far up on the slope of the Blue Ridge Mountains. His company is located at Hendersonville, about seven miles from Finley's tent. Mr. Finley felt the need of quiet and exclusiveness, where he could meditate about the many scripts which he has in the course of production and keep in close communion with nature, absorbing the local color and associations.

"Lupin, the Gentleman Burglar"

Fourth Episode of Lupin Series—Interesting Three-Part Detective Story—Released by Pasquali-American.

DETECTIVE stories are always interesting; these Lupin subjects are unusually so, largely because of the cleverness of the principal character, Lupin, and the unexpected ending of the story as well as the richness of the interior settings which mark the latest and fourth episode of this series, now ready for release by the Pasquali-American Company under the title of "Lupin, the Gentleman Burglar." This subject is in three parts and is full of action from the opening scene.

The first part is mostly in the way of an introduction to the real exploits of Lupin. James Gordon has shuffled off this mortal coil and left his vast estate to his niece, Mrs. Josette Percy, beautifully voluptuous, and, presumably, a widow. According to the will she is to find directions for securing the estate of her uncle in a rare volume of Egyptian lore, written in such a manner that the application of heat to the page will disclose the instructions. When a search is made for the book it cannot be found—some one has made away with it.

About this time the famous gentleman burglar Lupin is released from prison, and a notice to that effect printed in a newspaper is shown to Mrs. Percy. The matter suggests to her the advisability of "setting a thief to catch a thief," so she sends for Lupin and tells him of her dilemma. Lupin sets at work at once upon the theory that Sir Rhulend, a famous collector of Egyptian relics, would naturally be the person to acquire the lost parchment if it was offered for sale. Thereupon he determines to make the acquaintance of Sir Rhulend and the way in which he does it is ingenious. Disguising himself, Lupin awaits outside Sir Rhulend's door, and when that personage emerges for his morning walk Lupin steals his watch and runs away. He gains sufficient distance to make another change in his disguise so that, when his pursuers arrive, he appears before them in gentlemanly attire, restores the watch to its owner, indicating that the thief has just escaped.

Refusing a reward in money Lupin gains what he desired—an invitation to visit the collector and inspect his treasures. Thus he is able to discover the whereabouts of the lost parchment and the way to secure it. In this he is unwittingly aided by Sir Rhulend's valet, who plans to rob his employer on the same night that Lupin steals the book from the safe. For the further adventures of Lupin the writer respectfully refers readers to the picture itself, assuring them that they will be fully repaid for their effort.

Along with the thread of sense that runs through this story there is a fund of humor, for Lupin's exploits cannot be taken in sober seriousness, even though he does employ an occasional device of the true investigator of crime. In this picture he concludes by returning to Sir Rhulend, not the real jewels stolen by the valet, but imitations, while he bestows the genuine treasures upon Mrs. Percy, whom he marries. This is his little joke and reveals the real Lupin, at heart still a burglar. The subject is one that is certain to entertain.

Robert Edeson, Lasky Star

WITHOUT doubt one of the leading romantic actors on the American stage, and one of the most dignified of stars, Robert Edeson, having just completed his first motion picture production, "The Call of the North," for the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, is so enamored of the attractiveness of screen drama, pantomimic acting and the general appeal of the camera, that the public is to see this estimable player in several more photoplays.

Robert Edeson.

"The Call of the North," which will be seen at the Strand Monday, August 10, considered by Mr. Lasky and all concerned in its production as the most attractive subject yet created by the Lasky organization, is said to be atmospherically and histrionically a perfect picture. Immediately after witnessing the production in a private studio, Mr. Goldfish, executive head of the Lasky Company, telegraphed Mr. Edeson suggesting that he remain at Hollywood indefinitely and Mr. Edeson replied by stating that he was so well pleased with "The Call of the North" that he would like to do his other famous stage success, "Where the Trail Divides," which is a sequel to "Strongheart," in which Mr. Edeson starred for several years.

"Where the Trail Divides" was secured by Mr. Goldfish, and will be the December release of the Lasky company.

Stuart Edward White, author of "Conjuror's House," from which "The Call of the North" was made into a stage play, said that the picture production was as near perfect in detail and locale as man and nature combined could make it.

KLATT BUILDING ANOTHER HOUSE.

A moving picture theater of Colonial construction is in the course of erection on the south side of East Grand boulevard, near Woodward avenue, Detroit, Mich. It is being built by William F. Klatt. The plans call for a moving picture emporium artistic in exterior and interior design, with a seating capacity of 1,550. The theater will have the latest appointments, and will cost about $70,000 to construct.

SAWYER ANNOUNCES NEW OFFICES.

Film Mart Intends Distribution Through Completed List of Thirty or More Prints.

Sawyer, Inc., are this week publishing the names and addresses of their first series of Zones to be used for the distribution of the Sawyer pictures. When the thirty offices are under way and in operation, it will mean a distribution of at least thirty prints and in the cases of the larger cities, such as New York and Chicago, additional prints will be needed.

Realizing that direct booking will be the only solution for the manufacturer, Sawyer, Inc., have gone ahead on their zone plan and the manufacturers who are booking through Sawyer, Inc., think they have adopted the right method for marketing their pictures. The list of the new affiliations of the Sawyer company show some interesting facts. The Sawyer interests are handled in Chicago by the Union Film Company. Mr. Hopp, the president of this company, is too well known in the motion picture trade to require an introduction.

The southern office, which is located in Knoxville, Tenn., is managed by Frank Rogers, who has made a name for himself as a successful theatrical man. The New England interests of Sawyer, Inc., will be handled by the Phoenix Film Company, 164 Federal street, Boston. This company is a newcomer, but from its personnel it should be very successful. Mr. Osborn and Mr. Peters, the two active members of the company, are both up-to-date, aggressive young men, with ample capital to successfully carry on the business.

In Albany F. G. Terwilliger has in the past three weeks thoroughly established the Sawyer programs in the northern and eastern part of New York State. Mr. Terwilliger has been in the film business a number of years. Other connections made are mentioned in the Sawyer, Inc., advertisement on another page of this issue; it gives full particulars.

CAPTAIN ROSER MISQUOTED.

There appeared in the issue of the Moving Picture World of July 25 a paragraph which purported to be an expression from Capt. A. J. Roser, of Kingston, Jamaica, relative to the citizens of that town. Captain Roser later called at the office of the Moving Picture World and stated that his remarks had been misunderstod and that he did not utter anything of a nature uncomplimentary to the citizens of Jamaica.

The Moving Picture World is informed that Captain Roser has invested a large sum of money in building and beautifying his theater in Kingston and we are glad to publish this explanation in his behalf. Captain Roser is an Englishman and veteran of the Boer War, in which conflict he won his commission for signal bravery and soldierly ability; he is a gentleman of excellent character and has the respect and patronage of his townsmen.

COLLINS NEW EDISON DIRECTOR.

John Hancock Collins, for four years with the Edison Company, has recently been promoted to the position of director. Under his former title of stage manager, Mr. Collins was responsible for the grandeur of the settings in the Edison films and conceived the idea for the magnificent booth with the fountain at the recent exposition held at Grand Central Palace. He is an ambitious and aggressive youth, who possesses all the qualifications necessary for the success of a stage director.

JOYCE FAIR WITH EDISON.

Joyce Fair, the little ten-year-old actress now playing in "The Dummy" on the legitimate stage is being featured as "Mary Jane" in the "Buster Brown" comedies of the Edison Company.

INCE AND SENNETT IN TOWN.

As stated in the Moving Picture World of last week, Tom Ince and Mack Sennett, directors of the New York Motion Picture Company, who are located at the company's plant near Los Angeles, Cal., arrived in New York and have been in consulation with their principals for several days regarding future plans. Notwithstanding the statement that there was no friction between Messrs. Ince and Sennett and the company by which they are employed, it seems that some have drawn that inference from the story of last week. Accordingly, at the request of the interested parties, we reiterate the previous statement that the relations between all parties is of a most cordial and satisfactory nature and that the presence of Messrs. Ince and Sennett in New York is for the purpose of outlining future plans for the betterment and the increase of the New York Motion Picture Company's productions. At the time this issue of the Moving Picture World was sent to press the parties were still in consultation.

KEANOGRAPH FILMS A BIG FIRE.

Realism painful to many people who have a strong dislike to being awakened at 4 o'clock in the morning marked the taking of one of the major scenes in the spectacular photoplay "Money," now nearing completion by the United Keanograph Film Company of Fairfax, Cal. For fifteen miles around the sky was illuminated on the morning of July 24. The clanging of fire engines, whose noise was accentuated because of the studio's location in a mountainous country, and the echo and re-echo of shouts, orders, cries for help, etc., made a mad din sufficient to bring even the heaviest sleepers to protesting consciousness.

James Keane, president and general manager of the company and director of the photoplay of which he is also the author, has gone to enormous expense in getting effects. His engaging of 2,000 people for one scene is significant of his methods.

PEARL WHITE THROWN FROM CAB.

As the heroine of "The Perils of Pauline" Miss Pearl White seems to be able to go through almost everything and escape without physical harm, but when she takes up some perfectly harmless diversion something is sure to happen. The other evening Miss White felt a desire to indulge in the ancient and almost forgotten pastime of riding in a hansom cab through Central Park. Everybody knows that this is a real kindergarten game, but do you suppose that Miss Pearl Pauline could get away with it without something happening? Hardly had she begun to enjoy the sensation of doing something safe and sane when the cab horse stumbled coming down a hill and pitched Miss Pearl out on her head. The fall reduced her to a state of insensibility, sprained her wrist and bruised her painfully about the arms and face. An ambulance surgeon wanted to take her to a hospital, but when Pearl came to she insisted on continuing the drive.

MARGARITA FISCHER AS TRIXY.

Miss Margarita Fischer as Trixy in "A Midsummer's Love Tangle" (Beauty), has a delightful part. Margarita Fischer is one of the most vivacious actresses appearing on the screen, and her part is brimful of mischief and intrigue. In one of the last scenes in particular her versatility is called into play. From the winsome madcap she becomes the demure little maiden who wheedles from her father his consent to an interview with her sweetheart, although the interview ends most disastrously for all concerned. Harry Pollard is himself some yachtsman, and as a great many scenes necessitated a sailboat, he thoroughlyy enjoyed the production of "A Midsummer's Love Tangle."

NEW YORK ASSOCIATION APPOINTS AMALGAMATION COMMITTEE.

A committee consisting of Philip Rosenson, A. A. Corn, Lee A. Ochs and William Brandt of the New York City Association of Exhibitors, has been appointed to represent that organization in the matter of amalgamation with the New York City Local of the State League. The League Local is represented by a committee consisting of John J. Wittman, M. L. Fleischman, Louis Harris, J. Becker, James Deegan and Mr. Fineblatt. Up to the present writing nothing definite has been decided upon. A meeting of the committees was held at the Marlboro Hotel on Friday, July 31.

McGRAW AS "DETECTIVE SWIFT."

Toward the end of August the Eclectic Film Company will release a three-part picture entitled "Detective Swift," in which John J. McGraw, manager of the New York Giants, will play the leading part, the character being that of Detective Swift. Many of the scenes of this subject were taken during the trip of the Giants and White Sox around the world. The play was written by Frank McGlynn, who also directed its production. This subject should awaken a lively interest among both baseball and photoplay fans.

BODINE GOES TO EUROPE.

H. A. Bodine, director of sales for the Raw Film Supply Company, sailed July 30 on the SS. President Grant of the Hamburg-American line for a tour of Europe. He will visit the plants of the Raw Film Supply Company and the Ambrosio Film Company and will study trade conditions generally.

"The Boundary Rider"

Smugglers Float Opium in Logs Down Mountain Stream in Eclectic Offering Made by Wharton Company.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THERE is an interesting shifting of the center of attention in a new Eclectic five-reel story made in America by the Wharton Company. Of course, in depicting anything but the simplest situation the attention has to be called away from this group of characters and given to that until, at the climax, all that are left are found closely interlocked in the final struggle, when each has given to him his proper and particular fate. In "The Boundary Rider," not a love story, but a tale of adventure in which detectives help an innocent fugitive and victim of circumstance who, so to speak, is hustled into the race they have already begun with a well organized band of opium smugglers, the author, instead of beginning with a complicated situation, has opened with a simple one, complicated it, and simplified it again at the close. This more direct and concrete way of telling a story is dramatic and more effective on the screen, though to a novelist the elaborate way is usually preferable.

The chief feature of the picture is the clever way in which the smugglers get their contraband across the boundary. A mountain torrent flows from the Canadian side and, a mile or so across the border, falls over a precipice, and under this is a grotto where men can stand and, screened by the curtain of water, collect the logs full of opium sent down stream by confederates across the line. The hero of the tale is the boundary rider, an official of the customs department.

Scene from "The Boundary Rider" (Eclectic).

He is also the fugitive and had been the innocent clerk of the smugglers' "fence" in an American city. The chief smuggler had come to this man's office while the clerk was out and there had been a quarrel. The "fence" was found dead and circumstance had accused the clerk who, escaping, had got a job as a rider.

Two detectives are especially interested in the case. One is a woman and she has a clue that none but she knows of and which is to be used at the end to clear the rider and to convict the murderer. In order to have the hero again accused of murder at the very time when he has courageously arrested the chief smuggler, the man detective is to be in the neighborhood of the stream on vacation. We are shown that the chief smuggler, after a quarrel with his servant, has employed a Chinaman—the woman detective in disguise. She is not recognizable, and her unmasking at the climax gives a tingle of surprise. The one weakness of the plot is that we are not made particularly interested in that Chinaman soon enough. That we are kept in ignorance of her identity is—it may be—a good point; but it would have been better to have attracted attention to her in some significant way earlier in the action. When we find her seeking through the smuggler's trunk for something—it's the proof of her clue—we wonder what she (we think her just a Chinaman) is doing; but at this point it is more apt to seem irrelevant than significant and the suspense at this point is so intense that we don't give it the attention it warrants. There are several ways of handling this character better than the author has here done. But, though we feel a slipping of the picture's clutch as we approach the climax, we are so near the top of the hill that we get over, notwithstanding. It is a good offering, with much interest and suspense, and we commend it as entertainment. The acting is conventional, but intelligent—just what was needed for this kind of story. The staging and photography are both competent, while those scenes that show the stream and the smugglers' method of getting the opium over the boundary are particularly fine.

"The Curse of the Scarabee Ruby."

A Three-Part Gaumont Subject Dealing with the Theme of Dual Personality—Many Interesting Scenes Well Photographed.

THE theme of dual personality has been portrayed many times and in many ways in pictures. It is possible that the Gaumont Company has discovered a new way of presenting it in the subject "The Curse of the Scarabee Ruby," released August 1. The picture is in three parts and has sufficient action to hold interest as well as being a well told story.

In the first part we are told that two sisters, daughters of the high priest Yuma, are guardians of the sacred ruby hung about the neck of their god and that one of them is mortally wounded when the other, with the aid of her lover, attempts to steal the sacred gem. The father, discovering the attempted theft and his dying daughter, pronounces a curse upon the Scarabee ruby, decreeing that the body of whoever should subsequently wear it should be entered by two conflicting spirits—one good and the other evil.

Hundreds of years afterward Peter Sylvester buys a quaint jewel at the shop of a collector and presents it to his fiancee, Mona Dorsay. From that time Mona, always sweet and maidenly by day, becomes possessed with an impulse to consort with the lowest characters at night. But whatever her nocturnal excursions may be she wakes up in the morning unconscious of what has happened during the night.

Through the second part of the picture is shown scenes of Parisian cabarets and dance halls where Mona lives a wild night life and is especially useful to the gang of thieves with whom she associated in luring wealthy strangers into the toils of the thieves. Peter happens accidentally into one of these haunts and recognizes Mona among the others, but when he calls to see her in the morning she is so sweetly unconscious of his suspicions that he is completely disarmed. At another time he makes a visit to the dance hall to be sure that he is mistaken, but when he sees Mona he attempts to take her away and is wounded in a fight that immediately occurs.

Telling his suspicions to his father, Peter attempts to solve the mystery he is certain envelops his sweetheart. Newspaper stories of an escapade in which Mona was concerned are shown both the girl and her mother, but nothing can be explained. It is then decided to watch the girl, upon the theory that she is a somnambulist. That night she is detained when she attempts to leave the house, and the father removes from her neck the fatal jewel, which he takes home with him. Upon making an examination of the jewel he discovers the inscription explaining the fatal charm of the sacred Scarabee. Showing this to his son they decide to destroy the ruby then and there.

Next day everything is explained to the mother and the lovers are again united and happy, Peter having given Mona a new pendant upon which there was no curse. There are a number of very beautiful interior scenes in this subject; the dance hall scenes are lively and interesting and the photography throughout of good quality.

"A Romance of the Sawdust Ring."

Two Reels—Domino.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS is an exceptionally good circus story in two reels, which, by the way, are remarkably free from padding. The plot itself is of the melodramatic variety, which means that the hero, the heroine and the villain revolve around a complicated situation until virtue finally triumphs. The circus atmosphere has never been portrayed with greater fidelity than is shown in these reels. This is the sort of merit which an audience always appreciates. The circus itself is always interesting, and such a lifelike portrayal is equally so. The leading part is taken by Paul Borzage, whose clever work in "The Wrath of the Gods" will be remembered. Not the least striking feature of this acceptable production is the handling of the wild animals in connection with a logical development of the plot. The whole thing is managed with consummate skill and conveys an irresistible impression of reality. The attack of the leopard upon the Hindu who intrigued with the ringmaster for the destruction of the heroine's sweetheart was startling in its realism. The photography, settings and acting are uniformly good.

Cleveland Exhibitors Unite

Joint Meeting of Members of League, Local No. 1, and Photoplay Board of Trade.

THE last vestige of disruption in the ranks of Cleveland motion picture exhibitors disappeared Wednesday, July 22, when members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, Local No. 1, and members of the Cleveland Photoplay Board of Trade brought about complete amalgamation. As a fitting blessing to burial of the hatchet, M. A. Neff, retiring president of the national organization, who by chance was in Cleveland, made a short talk. He expressed gratification on the outcome of the meeting and the fact that general harmony and good-will has so quickly followed the Dayton convention. President Megowan, of the League, called the meeting to order and served as chairman. He made it plain that the meeting was not that of the League, Local No. 1, but an open meeting of exhibitors at which each one was invited to voice his opinion on the best means to accomplish reunion of the forces which were split just a year ago.

Sam Morris, president of the Photoplay Board of Trade, explained that the board would dissolve as soon as certain obligations were met and business on hand cleared up. He offered the suggestion that members of the Board, who seceded from the League a year ago, be entered on the roster of the League as members, and that they be notified of that action and the necessity of payment of dues. If the members then disregarded the dues they were to be stricken off the enrollment automatically. His suggestion met with favor, and a resolution to push the enrollment was taken. Secretary Horsey of the League and Secretary S. A. Lustig of the Board then proceeded to check up the members. Another meeting, to take place Wednesday, July 29, at the "old home" in the Columbia building was agreed upon, there to complete reorganization. President Megowan, speaking for himself and other officials of the League local, announced that the wishes of the majority would be respected and that the present officers would retire in favor of new if such conclusion was reached at the next meeting.

Former President Neff, by coincidence, was in Cleveland at the time of the meeting and the exhibitors sent a committee to bring him before them. He expressed pleasure at the action of the exhibitors in effecting peace and offered his assistance in any way it could be utilized. He then warned the assemblage that concerted action only would stave off legislation that would be directed against film theaters, and advised them to cement their relations into a strong organization that would go to the front as a body whenever occasion should arise. RARIDAN.

AUSTRIA ANTICIPATES PICTURE STORY.

By Her Declaration of War She May Bring About in 1914 What Johnston Predicted for 1916.

When Lorimer Johnston wrote the scenario for "The Envoy Extraordinary," which is now nearing completion by the Santa Barbara Motion Picture Co. in California, he little dreamed that the story of this picture, the time of which he laid in 1916, would become a reality in 1914. The story is based on a supposed international war of nations, and with the present reports from Europe of the clash between the Austrians and Servians, which may embroil the other European nations, it looks as though Mr. Johnston had made a very true forecast of European conditions. However, Mr. Johnston's story brings about a happy arrangement among the powers, "The Envoy Extraordinary" helping to avert the threatened war.

Jack Nelson, who plays the Envoy, is well known as a great athlete as well as a clever actor. The big punch of the picture lies in a situation similar to that now taking place in Europe. As the declaration of war is about to be signed "The Envoy Extraordinary" rushes to the table where the Emperor is sitting, seizes the declaration of war and destroys it. The papers carried by the Envoy show to the assembled Ambassadors that they have been laboring under misapprehensions brought on by a foreign officer, who is trying to bring about a war to further his own selfish interests. This picture will be released by Sawyer, Inc., about August 15, and should prove a most timely subject.

Mr. Johnston is well known among the motion picture trade as a producer of high-class pictures, and this new picture will strengthen for him the position he now holds as one of the great American directors. The Santa Barbara Motion Picture Company has spared no expense in producing this subject, which will be in five reels.

An Injustice Corrected

Editor the Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir: In your issue of July 19, you saw fit to publish a supposed grievance from the manager of the Alhambra Theater, Perry, New York, complaining of the treatment he received from a film exchange in Chicago, booking the "Hagenbeck-Wallace Spectacular" films. This is only another instance of managers of rival houses trying to make a goat of the film companies. In order to set your paper and the trade right on this matter, the facts briefly are as follows:

Our traveling representative arranged the deal with Mr. Hampton of LeRoy, N. Y., for a tentative number of exhibitions of the subject in "near-by territory"; details to be furnished us in a later mail, as to the boundaries of such territory.

Meantime the manager from Perry got wind of the fact that the first-class house in his town—which was his opposition—had secured the picture from Mr. Hampton, of LeRoy. This was before any advices had reached our office of Hampton's closing the deal with our road representaitive. The Alhambra man at Perry got busy quick, and booked the picture direct from Chicago; our office having heard nothing up to that time of such town being booked by anyone accepted the booking. The following day advices reached our office from both our road representative and Mr. Hampton, of the arranging of this deal, and by a later mail, that same day, we received contract from Mr. Hampton, specifying the names of towns in the territory contracted, which included Perry, N. Y.; whereupon, we immediately wired Perry that Mr. Hampton, having taken over Western New York, from Elmira to Buffalo, for a limited time, we would have to cancel his single date, and offered him the feature at a later date, after the Hampton contract had expired. This was before the Alhambra man had received or done any advertising whatever. The Alhambra man at Perry was booked on the 9th, and canceled on the 10th, for reasons given, and was extended every courtesy, and advised promptly by both letter and wire, of the facts, as above cited, giving the reasons for the cancellation, so the Perry man hasn't a leg to stand on from the standpoint of truth and fair-dealing from this firm, as the date he originally desired was the 17th, or seven days from the time of cancellation on the 10th, giving him ample time to book any feature he could get for a week later. The Perry man is not "out" anything, and he has seen fit to misstate the facts, and to make it appear that he is the injured party.

Nearly every film company has had a similar experience and the "raw deal" is nearly always handed to the film people by certain exhibitors who, in trying to frame up something on their opposition, use the film concern as a "patsy" and then set up a wail when detected in such transactions, and they fail to get away with it.

Hoping that in the spirit of fair play, you will favor us with a publication of our side of the story as widely as the previous misstatement was circulated, we are, Yours truly,

BURNS ACTS IN HIS OWN STORY.

Well-Known Detective Putting On Screen the Details of a Counterfeiting Case.

William J. Burns has returned to New York from Washington, D. C., where the final scenes were taken for the moving picture production of his best-known Secret Service case, the Philadelphia-Lancaster counterfeiting mystery. In the films this restaging of the case will be known as "The $5,000,000 Counterfeiting Plot." It is in 600 scenes and six parts. The picture has been produced under the personal direction of Mr. Burns, in order that the details be correct; and the detective appears in nearly all of the scenes, together with former members of the Secret Service.

This is the first time that any actual detective case has ever been presented, showing the exact manner in which the crime occurred and was detected. Mr. Burns explains that he is appearing in these films in order to give the public a correct idea of detective work, and to show that it is merely an application of common sense.

The scenes were taken at the Treasury Department, Washington, Moyamensing Prison, Philadelphia, Lancaster and New York City. Mr. Burns shows on the screen how the Monroe-head hundred-dollar silver certificates were made. These counterfeits were so remarkable that it necessitated the Secretary of the Treasury recalling the entire issue of that currency, amounting to over twenty-seven million dollars. These pictures will be presented at a special engagement at a Broadway theater, beginning in August.

Comsumers of Chicago Expanding

Company Intends Erecting Studio and Finishing Plant in the Vicinity of the Lake City.

The Consumers Feature Film Service, of Chicago, is making great advancement, and has increased its capital stock to $1,500,000. The new company is to be hereafter known as the Consumers Film Corporation. The firm has executive offices in the new building facing Lake Michigan at 30 North Michigan Boulevard and a central film exchange in the Mallers Building, 5 South Wabash avenue. R. Levine, vice-president of the company, is now in New York purchasing all features possible that will conform to the high standard set by the company. He will remain east indefinitely, making contracts with producers and importers. That this company means business is assured by the fact that there is no stock for sale to the general public. The organization has a unique method of supplying service to the exhibitor that does not require the use of outside capital.

The Consumers Film Corporation has arranged to open offices in most of the large cities of the United States, under the supervision of district managers. The firm now has about fifty features, all of merit, and as fast as Mr. Levine's purchases are made in New York the prints will be shipped to Chicago for distribution among the company's exchanges.

Morton D. Harris, president of the company, stated to the representative of this paper that he expects to be able to make a general announcement to the trade within the next thirty days, at which time the company will offer in its advertising a service to exhibitors that will cause them to make application by wire. Mr. Harris further said that the organization is practically complete, and that the men at the head of the different departments are thoroughlv familiar with all branches of the film business. The company's manufacturing plant will be one of the most complete.

The company is at this time negotiating with the owners of 160 acres of beautiful woodland, upon which, if purchased, the studios and finishing plants will be erected. Mr. Harris stated that he could not announce at this time the exact location of the property, but said that it is not a very great distance from Chicago, and that the natural scenic effects are wonderful.

"A GREAT MISTAKE."

Newly-Organized Renowned Players' Film Company Starring Mme. K. Lipzin in Five-Part Photoplay.

MME. K. LIPZIN, widely-known star of the Yiddish stage, who has not only played with great success in her own theater in New York City but has also appeared at the head of her own traveling company in all of the principal cities of the United States and Canada, has hearkened unto the call of the "movies."

For the past four weeks Mme. Lipzin has been playing before the camera under the direction of the Renowned Players' Film Company, of the Candler Building, 220 West Forty-second street, which is engaged in making as its initial photoplay production a five-part picture, entitled "The Great Mistake." Prominent in Mme. Lipzin's support are Jacob Cone, Harold Vosberg, and little Katharine Lee, the clever child artist who has already won her photoplay spurs by appearing in such productions as Annette Kellermann's "Neptune's Daughter" and the Famous Players' "Scales of Justice."

Jacob Cone is general manager of the Renowned Players' Film Company, which plans to make a number of important productions within the next few months. "A Great Mistake" will be released about September 1, territory in this country being covered from the New York office and in Europe from offices already arranged for in London, Paris and Leipsic.

PAUL BOURGEOIS MAKING ANIMAL PICTURES.

Paul Bourgeois has organized the Paul Bourgeois Wild Animal Features, Inc., and has established a motion picture studio at Asheville, N. C. He was one of the pioneer wild animal picture makers. Eight years ago he was in Paris with Pathe and Gaumont. In the United States he has worked with Vitagraph, Eclair, Solax and Blache, and has just finished a six months' contract in St. Augustine, Fla., with Pathe. Mme. Bourgeois is an actress and animal trainer, and has played heavy leads in many pictures.

The Bourgeois Company will release shortly a big feature. The scenery and costumes were made especially for the subject. The scenes with the lions and tigers are taken without cages. Mr. Bourgeois has discovered a new way to photograph these subjects without danger of the animals running away, hurting people or without having any conflict between the different species of animals. Ten elephants are used in the production.

PATENTS COMPANY AND LASKY AGREE.

The Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, Inc., is named as the defendant in an action on file in the United States District Court to enjoin the film company from using the camera which it has been employing in its business on the ground that the machine infringes on the claims embodied in the Edison reissue patents controlled by the Motion Picture Patents Company. In addition to injunctive relief the complainant seeks an accounting of the profits which it is alleged have accrued to the defendant by reason of the alleged wrongful use of the camera, and the court is asked to assess triple damages against the Lasky Company. Not only does the complaint demand an injunction restraining the defendant from using its present camera or any other machine embodying the Edison claims, but it seeks an injunction stopping the Lasky Company from leasing photoplays manufactured through the use of the alleged infringing cameras to exhibitors.

The Lasky company consented to the entry of a decree last Monday enjoining it from continuing the acts complained of in the bill. An order was entered suspending the injunction, however, under a stipulation permitting the Lasky company to continue business without interference. It is understood the measure of damages will be adjusted amicably by the parties out of court.

Famous Players to Settle Suit Out of Court.

An action was begun in the United States District Court on Tuesday, July 28, against the Famous Players' Film Company by the Motion Picture Patents Company to enjoin the defendant film company from infringing on the claims embodied in the Edison reissue patents controlled by the plaintiff.

The Famous Players' Film Company consented to the entry of a decree admitting that it has been guilty of an infringement of the claims recently held to be valid in the litigation between the Motion Picture Patents Company and the Independent Film Manufacturing Company in which the Universal Film Manufacturing Company was subsequently brought in as a defendant. The famous Players' Company also consented to the incorporation of an injunction in the decree, and has signified its intention of adjusting the question of damages out of court to the satisfaction of the plaintiff.

INJUNCTION AGAINST ITALA AGAIN REFUSED.

On Monday, July 27, Justice Greenbaum in the Supreme Court in New York County, denied the second motion made by Morris Brodkin for a reargument of his former motion for an injunction restraining Harry R. Raver, Carlo Sciamengo and Itala Film Company of America from exhibiting "Cabiria" in New York and New Jersey, the ground of the justice's decision being that he had covered the issues presented to him on the former motion.

SMALLWOOD TAKES ERNEMANN AGENCY.

The Smallwood Film Corporation, of 175 Fifth Avenue, have contracted with the Ernemann-Photo-Kino Works, of Dresden, Germany, to handle their projector, known as the Ernemann Kinox, in the United States. The agreement entered into between the Smallwood and the Ernemann companies gives to the former the exclusive right to distribute the Ernemann projector in the New England States, New York, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, New Jersey, Maryland, Delaware, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Virginia, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin and Michigan.

The Ernemann projector has the same movement as the Ernemann moving picture camera. It has a series of three condensers, and the illumination is from a nitro-incandescent lamp. The lamp throws an illumination of 50 candlepower on a consumption of six volts. The projector is shaft-driven and has only one sprocket. The framing device frames an entire picture. It is easily carried, weighing but twenty-five pounds, rheostat included.

MACKIN—CALDWELL.

The third marriage in Kalem's Jacksonville forces is announced. John E. Mackin and Mrs. E. C. Caldwell are receiving at Kalem House the congratulations of their many friends. Mrs. Mackin was the widow of Edward C. Caldwell, son of Commodore Caldwell, U. S. N. She is well known in Boston and has made a host of friends during her year's stay in Jacksonville.

Mr. Mackin was for seven years a member of James K. Hackett's company. He has also played in the support of Virginia Harned and of John Mason.

Manufacturers' Advance Notes

"THE TENTH COMMANDMENT" (Imp).

Director Herbert Brenon of the Imp Company has just finished "The Tenth Commandment," a drama in three parts. The producer of "Neptune's Daughter" believes this tale of domestic life will prove to be one of the strongest pictures he has made. William E. Blaisdell is the author of the script. Mr. Blaisdell's story contains some unusual situations of heart-interest, of thrill and of pathos.

William E. Shay has the role of a doctor in love with his profession and also his wife. Ruth Donnelly portrays the wife, unreasonably jealous of her husband and misled by a designing acquaintance into a step that, while indiscreet, is nothing worse, but which nevertheless results in a separation. Miss Violet Mersereau is the nurse who successfully conceals from the doctor her love for him and who hesitates not to maintain her place at the operating table as the building burns about her, aiding the doctor operating upon his own child, but the fatherhood of which he believes to rest upon the man who destroyed his home.

William Welsh has the part of the man who brings unhappiness to the doctor's family and who perishes in the fire started through his drunken carelessness. Little Katherine Lee will be seen in the role of the child who is caught under the doctor's knife as the hotel breaks into flames, and who cannot be removed until the operation is completed.

There is a large supporting cast. The Universal Company has expended a goodly sum on the production, especially on the fire scenes. If the players are to be believed these have unusual realism. While these enhance the interest, at the same time the picture easily will carry on its straight dramatic quality.

BOX OFFICE ATTRACTIONS DOING BIG BUSINESS.

The Box Office Attractions Film Rental Company is opening its own offices for the distribution of its pictures all over the United States and Canada. This will naturally place it in the closest touch with its patrons and give it a more efficient control of the distribution of its films. As is well known, this company deals not only in big feature offerings, but also in strong single-reel pictures. About the beginning of August it has decided to begin production of pictures, and these at the start will be mostly comedies to fill the special demands of picture spectators. This single-company proposition is full of interest and will be watched with the closest attention by all film makers in the business. One thing quite apparent at the present time is the breadth of appeal in its offerings and the popular quality of most of its stories. The Balboa Company's output, of which they have bought much, is almost universally popular.

"THE FORBIDDEN TRAIL" (Kleine).

Another one of the popular Kleine series of two-part subjects featuring Miss Francesca Bertini, an international favorite among the popular photoplay actresses of the day, will be released when "The Forbidden Trail" is offered by the General Film Company, Tuesday, August 11. In this unusually powerful photodrama, Miss Bertini is said to prove beyond question her right to be classed among the leading emotional players of Europe and America. The scenario has given her splendid opportunities, and she has overlooked not a one.

"The Forbidden Trail" tells the story of a young woman married to a middle-aged arctic explorer. Subjected to constant outbursts of unfounded jealousy on the part of her grizzled husband, she finally rebels. Then youth meets youth, and together the young wife and her husband's friend walk "the forbidden trail." The climax is a startling one, something new in pictures. The subject was produced under the personal direction of Emilio Ghione, one of the foremost directors on the Continent, and he himself is a member of Miss Bertini's supporting cast, as is also Albert Collins, a player well and favorably known in both Europe and America.

KLEINE'S "VENDETTA" THROUGH GENERAL FILM.

Thousands of ardent admirers of the novelist Marie Corelli will hail with enthusiasm the release of George Kleine's splendid four-reel feature "Vendetta," through the Special Feature Department of the General Film Co., September 1. The film story is adapted from Miss Corelli's powerful novel of the same name, and in telling the thrilling tale in picture form, the manufacturers have overlooked none of the splendid opportunities given them by the novelist. The photoplay follows the original book version closely, visualizing all of the tensely exciting situations so familiar to Corelli readers.

UNITED STATES FEATURE FILM AT WORK.

Indians, riders, horses, actors and actresses are now being pressed into service by the United States Feature Film Company of Chico, Cal., for the making of the first feature film to be put out by this company. George Sontag is personally superintending the action and will be a leading character in the first picture, which will be a six-reeler under the title of "Evans and Sontag in the Folly of a Life of Crime." The company is controlled by Chico capital.

"THE CALL OF THE NORTH" (Lasky).

THE call of the North," which will be released by the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, August 10, sums up as one of the most artistically arranged and most minutely detailed of the year. It is said to have cost $40,000 in money and four months in time. When the picture went into rehearsals, Stuart Edward White, author of "Conjuror's House," from which the play was taken, spent four weeks in Canada, engaging Indians and various types significant of the northern woods. Fifteen Big Tiger Indians were secured. A foraging party then went on the hunt for a certain type of canoe peculiar to the Tiger Tribe Indians. One was located at Ahitiba, Canada, far north of Winnipeg. This, together with the Indians and a number of spruce trees, were transported to Hollywood, Cal., where the first stages of the photoplay were set.

Twenty Silver Fox and eighteen Black Fox furs grace the interior of the Hudson Bay Post at Conjuror's House, where the latter scenes are staged. One hundred players journeyed from Los Angeles to the Great Bear Valley, in Lower California, where they camped for five days while the water scenes were being enacted, and then, after being joined by the eighteen Indians, the company traveled to Moose Factory, Canada, for the final score of scenes. The final four reels of this five-part play are exteriors, two of which were taken 8,800 feet above sea level.

"THE PRICE PAID" (Eclair).

The Eclair Film Company, Inc., has turned out a very creditable political drama in the production "The Price Paid," a two-reel feature, released Wednesday, August 12. Featuring Robert Frazer and Edna Payne, this picture tells the story of political grafting and a man's weakness of character, both of which bring down heavy punishment upon the heads of the offenders. The story itself is most interesting.

CLEO MADISON HAS NARROW ESCAPE.

Cleo Madison, who is being featured in the "Trey o' Hearts" serial (Universal), underwent the crowning sensational incident in her life recently during the filming of "White Water," the second installment of the series.

For the purpose of injecting realism into the picture and that the specified business of the story might be carried out to the letter, she allowed herself to be carried a half-mile through rapids of the San Gabriel river. It was a task which would cause a strong man and a good swimmer to flinch; but Miss Madison does not know the name of fear, and it is not a question what her director, Wilfred Lucas, can prevail upon her to do, but what he can prevail upon her not to do.

Scene from "Trey of Hearts" (Universal).

The waters of the San Gabriel river are icy cold. The channel of the river not only runs down a steep incline, but the bed of the river is strewn with large bolders. Although Miss Madison is not an expert swimmer, she plunged into the cold water and piloted herself through the dangerous rapids without mishap. The result was a most convincing piece of realism.

"A SUSPENDED CEREMONY" (Beauty).

The Beauty Company, under direction of Harry Pollard, has put out a feature single-reel production under the title of "A Suspended Ceremony." This is a beautiful sequel to the subject "A Midsummer's Love Tangle," although each is a complete story in itself. There is ample opportunity for additional subjects, and it is hoped that subsequent releases will take up the trend of the story where it stops with this installment.

Margarita Fischer plays the lead, and she is supported by an apt cast with little Kathie and Peter the Great, the Beauty English bull terrier, playing the important roles. Harry Pollard plays opposite to Margarita Fischer, and the two stars do some exceptionally clever work.

"A DAUGHTER OF EVE" (Lubin).

William Kitchell has written a very simple but pretty story of farm life and the sweet little conspiracies among a good family to secure advantages, the chief quantity being love. While you have to laugh at the little sins of the dear old mother the tears will come to your eyes when you realize that it is all for her beloved daughter that she makes mistakes. Dame Fortune is kind, however, and straightens out the discrepancies which caused embarrassment. The right man gets the girl, and in the end the sun shines through the windows of the honest homestead. The picture is beautifully staged by Barry O'Neil, who is a past master at pathos, and the cast includes Ethel Clayton, Joseph Kaufman, Charles Brandt and Mrs. George Walters, with many others.

"THE CELLAR OF DEATH" (I. S. Plaut Co.).

This three-reel feature is modeled on a popular detective story. It abounds in interesting situations, and thrills are scattered all through its scenes. It deals with a secret organization of which a man high in society is the chief. He keeps an opium joint into which he beguiles the friend and assistant of a famous painter. From his victim he obtains the keys to the painter's safe, in which the famous Gordon diamonds have been put for safe keeping by their owner, who has come to be painted in the studio. A girl of the underworld whom the painter has selected for a model falls in love with him and becomes jealous of his aristocratic visitor. She betrays the secret of the diamonds to the chieftain of the villainous gang. He invades the painter's home and steals the diamonds. Later the artist himself is caught by the villains and cast into the cellar of death, a dreadful place which the villains slowly fill with water, thus drowning their victim. The jealous girl, tortured by remorse, now hastens to rescue the artist and everything ends very happily. The photography is good, the acting is good and the settings are well chosen.

MISS BESSIE BARRISCALE IN BELASCO PLAY.

Miss Bessie Barriscale, at present playing leading roles in the Belasco stock company, Los Angeles, and who originated the role of Juanita in David Belasco's road production of "The Rose of the Rancho," has been secured by the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, Inc., to appear in the motion picture production of that play.

"The Rose of the Rancho" will be one of the first Belasco productions from the Lasky studio, and will be staged in the mission country in Southern California. Miss Barriscale has long been identified with Belasco productions. She has played the part of The Girl in "The Girl of the Golden West" and the leading role in "The Warrens of Virginia."

Notes of the Trade

NED FINLEY, directing Vitagrapher, down in the wilds of North Carolina, rode into the nearest town the other evening to fill with his favorite white wine the demijohn attached to his saddle. The serenity of the return trip was broken by a rough "Hold up your hands." They went up. Two revenue officers examined the contents of the jug and laughed. They had the hilarity all to themselves, as it was several minutes before the Vitagraph man discovered any comedy in the situation.

"Bennie of Lubinville" is no more of Lubinville. He now is Mr. Bennie Zeidman, "Publicity Liberty Motion Picture Company, Germantown, Pa." In his four years as nominally telephone operator at the Lubin plant he met a host of film people. More than that, he found time to do many things other than his prescribed work, especially in a publicity way, so he comes to his new work with a wide knowledge of his game. He was in New York last week on his way to Newport. He said it was just a case of a bit of a vacation before starting in on his Bennie of Libertyville job.

Exhibitors are warned that the American rights, including copyright, for the Cines four-part feature, "The Golden Beetle," are held by George Kleine, 166 North State street, Chicago. It is reported that a spurious copy of this film is in circulation in the United States and that several exhibitors have already been victimized. Word from the Kleine offices states that no steps to prevent further imposition upon theater men will be left untaken.

In a scene from "The Kiss of Death," a forthcoming Pathe release now being produced by Wharton, Inc., at Ithaca, N. Y., a trolley car was sent over a bridge into a 200 foot gorge and dashed to pieces. This picture has a strong touch of mysticism in it, derived from the movements of an East Indian rajah in America. It is in four reels, release date not yet announced.

KENTUCKY.

COOL weather has helped things considerably with the Louisville exhibitors during the past week. Saturday night found the majority of the downtown houses packed to overflowing, and business is about as good right now as in the early spring or fall.

Although the motion picture houses were notified recently that they would have to enforce the law concerning standing in aisles and at the back of the house, few of the exhibitors have paid any heed to the order so far. Manager D. Levenson, of the Novelty Theater, however, is enforcing it strongly, as he is averse to allowing his house to become jammed.

R. S. Shrader, who, for a number of months has been in charge of the Louisville office of the Central Feature Film Company, has given up his position with the company and has gone back to Indianapolis as general manager of the World Film Corporation. His new offices are in the Willoughby building. A. C. Farrell, of the Indianapolis office of the Central Film Service Company, was sent to Louisville to take charge of the local office. Mr. Farrell has been purchasing agent for the main office, but is catching onto the booking end of the game rapidy.

Work at the Majestic Theater is progressing rapidy, but the remodeling will not be completed for about two weeks more. The loss of one-third of the house at a time is being felt, but it is a great deal better than to have to close the whole show while the work is being done.

C. W. Simmons, manager of the Gem Theater, of Monticello, has booked the feature "War With Huerta" for July 25. Admission prices will be raised to fifteen and twenty-five cents, the largest prices ever asked at Monticello. C. P. Davidson, of the Lyceum Theater, of Middlesboro, has booked the same feature for July 28 and he will also raise his prices. The Mexican War Feature Film Company, of Louisville, is more than satisfied with the results obtained with the big war feature.

Manager D. Levenson, of the Novelty Theater Company, Louisville, has organized the Novelty Film Company, which has purchased a quantity of comedy stuff, features and old films. The new company will have as its object the booking of fourth and fifth reels for exhibitors who wish to run a long program. Details have not been completed so far, and it will probably be thirty days before all arrangements are completed. Mr. Levenson, William Le Compte and Ernest Carpenter recently made a trip to St. Louis and Kansas City, Mo., where they picked up a quantity of good, used material. Fred Sheldon, local manager of the Warner Feature Film Company, and R. S. Shrader, of the Central Feature Film Company, promoted the idea but turned the proposition over to Mr. Levenson to work out, when Mr. Shrader decided to go to Indianapolis.

Although a large number of people prophesied that the new Star Theater, on Fourth avenue, Louisville, would not be successful, it is being proven that the "knockers" were looking at it from the wrong viewpoint. Manager L. J. Dittmar, who has made such a brilliant success with the Majestic Amusement Company, is also heavily interested in the new enterprise and has worked out the same ideas in the new house which made the old one so successful. Although it is a poor time of year to open a new downtown show, this house has been literally jammed for the past few days.

Manager Harry Bilger, of the Hopkins Theatre, Louisville, through some of his able assistants, put on a Negro Tango Contest last week, one of the best drawing cards ever shown at the local house. The regular run of pictures was shown in addition to the contest and the house was crowded. The gallery became so crowded with "dusky brethren" that the sale of tickets to the upper floor had to be stopped.

The Woodland Airdome, Louisville, which is operated by Alf Oldham, had a series of three picnics at the big enclosed park during the past week. Ten cents covered admission to the park for the picnic, and the pictures were naturally the main attraction.

The Broadway Amusement, Louisville, which has taken out a building permit for the erection of a new $50,000 theater, has decided not to tear down the old theater for the present, but to operate it until the new building is completed. After this the old theater will be made into an airdome for hot weather. New ground has been purchased adjoining the old theater. It was impossible to get this ground at a reasonable figure until the owners found that the Amusement Company would build without it, and then they came running with a proper proposal for the sale of their ground.

"Quo Vadis," which started at the National Theater, Louisville, last week for a three days' run, became so popular at the reduced admission price, that the three-day run was drawn out to one week, with admirable results. The house will close August 1 to be put in shape to open as a Keith vaudeville house this fall.

The Crescent Air Dome, Louisville, is continuing its new policy of running on Sunday, directly contrary to agreement made at the time the building permit was made. The feature "Sampson" was shown the first Sunday and on the past Sunday the three-reel "Theadora," of the Warner Feature Film Company, was exhibited. This latter picture was also shown at the big Chautauqua at Glenwood Park near New Albany, Ind., last week, by the Switow Amusement Company. The residents of the neighborhood have not even peeped on the subject so far and a large number of persons who were expected to oppose the Sunday movies are the first to pay admission on Sunday evening.

"The Million Dollar Mystery," produced by the Thanhouser Company, made a tremendous hit with the patrons of the Walnut Theater during the past week. This feature has had a great deal to do with making the house popular with the Louisville people.

Peter Knopf, Louisville, who, for a number of years was in the retail grocery business on Frankfort avenue, that city, is making arrangements for the building of a new motion picture house to cost in the neighborhood of $30,000 shortly. No definite plans have been made so far, but it is certain that a house will be built.

Frank E. Schoeffel, of Louisville, the Frankfort avenue butcher, who recently acquired the Palace Theater, on Shelby street, from John Rearidon, has confirmed the reports concerning his building a new motion picture theater back of the present theater, which will be used as a lobby. The new theater will cost about $16,000 and the plans are now being prepared. The Palace is the theater which has the honor of being on a belt car line on which no car fare is taken up.

A cyclone which struck the city of Henderson on Thursday, July 16, did about $500,000 damage to the business section of the town. The Nickelodeon Theater was unroofed and partially demolished and the rest of the theaters were put out of commission on account of the power house being partly wrecked. The town was in complete darkness after the storm, which happened about 6 o'clock in the evening, and the newspapers were printed by candle light and oil lamps. A few people were killed by falling masonry, and a large number were injured. A steamboat at the landing was blown high and dry on the bank. The power house is again running and the damage is being repaired.

Although the work has been going on for several days on the new theater of the Fourth Avenue Amusement Company, of Louisville, in the old John C. Lewis building, the building permit was not taken out until this week. The permit calls for an expenditure of $25,000 and a theater with a seating capacity of more than 1,000. D. X. Murphy & Brother are the architects.

CINCINNATI.

THE Casino Theater, at Linn and Clark streets, which has been under construction for several months, will be completed and opened within a few weeks, it is announced, and moving picture fans all over that part of the city are looking forward to the event with considerable interest. The building is certainly one of the handsomest in the city devoted to photoplays, and the announcement of the management that only first-run pictures will be used indicates that no expense will be spared to make the programs attractive to those attending. It is also understood that the music will be a feature. The date of the opening will be about the middle of August.

Extensive remodeling is going on in the Gayety theater, which recently closed for this purpose after several weeks of motion pictures, following the end of the burlesque season. One of the most expensive and interesting features of the work is the installation of an electric plant, which will generate current on power furnished by triplicate gas engines. The management has a block electric franchise, and will furnish current to a number of concerns in the immediate vicinity of the theater. Cables will be run to these houses, including two or three picture shows on Fifth and Vine streets, and current furnished them for all purposes. The engines are so constructed that in case the natural gas, which is now used as a fuel by most people in Cincinnati, gives out oil can be substituted, and the Gayety management expects to find considerable profit in its venture into the electric central-station business, although this, of course, is purely incidental.

A welcome visitor to the Cincinnati Mutual offices last week was "Billy" Clifford, who is a native of Urbana, O. He was accompanied by another Urbana citizen, Leon Berg, who manages the Clifford Theater, "Billy's" house, in his home town. The comedian will take to the road shortly with his popular show, "Believe Me," after a rest of some weeks at Urbana, where he was in personal charge of his theater.

Manager C. C. Hite, of the Cincinnati branch of the Mutual, has found the business of the office outgrowing its quarters, and is looking about for roomier offices. He and Assistant Manager Haynes have been on the trail of new business with signal success lately, as usual, and the move in question is becoming a matter of real necessity.

Moving pictures were made last week of what is believed to be the solitary survivor of the once numerous variety of bird known as the passenger pigeon, at the Cincinnati Zoo. Many persons now living can remember when the flocks of these birds passing over in their flights North or South darkened the skies, and continued for days at the time, in countless millions. Ruthless slaughter finally wiped them out, however, and the Cincinnati specimen is now the only one known to be alive. There is a standing offer of $1,000 for a mate for it, but none has yet made its appearance, although there are frequent reports of other birds being captured. They always turn out to be some other bird, however, and it was therefore thought desirable to take pictures of the lonely survivor of its race to preserve for the naturalists of future generations. A number of prints will be made in order that museums and institutions of learning may be supplied.

It is reported that the Cincinnati motion picture concern under the management of Clarence Runey may move to Dayton, if the Greater Dayton Association, of that city, which is after it, can make the proposition sufficiently interesting. J. Orrin Donovan, of Dayton, has taken the matter up and is making a strong bid for the location in that city of Mr. Runey's organization, which has given Cincinnati a vast amount of excellent advertising through the motion pictures which he has taken for the "Animated Weekly" of the Universal Film Co., and the possibility of getting similar advertising for Dayton appeals strongly to the live business men up there. The fact that the Wright aeroplane factory and aviation field are located in Dayton, not to mention the Soldiers' Home and other points of general interest, would make the city a good location for a concern handling news subjects, although the greater size of Cincinnati is a difficult fact to get away from.

The Central Building Co., of Dayton, is making rapid progress toward the work of constructing a twelve-story office building on Main street, opposite the City Hall, the first floor of which will be devoted to a handsome and up-to-date motion picture house. Excavation is about finished, and Work will be rushed with a view to having the building ready for occupancy as soon as possible. Nothing is known as yet regarding the arrangements for the lease of the theater.

Akron, O., will be featured in moving pictures in its own picture houses and then in others all over the country, following the taking of its fire department in action, in a parade and in exercises. More than $100,000 worth of equipment was gathered together to be immortalized by the moving picture route, and local exhibitors bid keenly for the honor of exhibiting the film first.

Joseph Thal, of Dayton, O., who recently made all preparations for the construction of a motion picture house in that city at Salem avenue and Lexington street, has been halted, temporarily, at least, by an injunction suit instituted by Irvin Wuichet, a resident of that neighborhood. So far the injunction has not been issued, the court taking the matter under advisement until after the evidence and the arguments have been heard.

One of the youngest "stars" yet seen in moving pictures was recently photographed for the edification of those who want to know what a prize baby looks like, in the person of Velma Louise Eads, of 1914 Knox street, Cincinnati, who was the winner of the gold medal awarded by the Health Department of the city several weeks ago for the most perfect baby in the city. More than three hundred babies, of all ages up to three years, were entered, but Miss Eads, aged one year, was found to be the finest specimen among the half-dozen or so 100-per cent. babies selected from the several hundred entries. Clarence E. Runey took her in motion for the Animated Weekly, and she will gladden the eyes of several hundred thousand people in the course of the film's journeys. CASEY.

MICHIGAN.

"BEST" is the name to go on the new electrical sign ordered by Manager Beeman at Benton Harbor. When he announced his inclination to cast off the old title "Swastika" hundreds of suggestions poured in, but "Best" was the favorite.

The motorcycle is a dandy little first aid to the manager whose films have gone astray. William Wright, of Charlotte, found one night that his program had been carried to Lansing, but a telegram to Lansing and a twin-cylinder dash across country enabled him to open the show only a few minutes late.

The Camera Shop at Grand Rapids has been doing some good moving picture work and the films have proved popular at the Ramona Theater.

The Temple Theater in Bay City is being remodeled.

Jake Irrer has opened the Lyceum Theater, a new moving picture show, at 500 Belinda, corner Fitzgerald, in Bay City. It will be a five-cent house.

Herman F. Stewart, the new pipe organist at the Elite Theater in Kalamazoo, is an accomplished musician, having spent some time in studying the pipe organ for accompanying photoplays.

WISCONSIN.

MANAGER J. B. OLINGER, of the American theater at Milwaukee, is running the "Lucille Love" serial for the second time, giving two reels a day with his regular show.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union and the Yahara Club, at Stoughton, want the moving picture shows in that city regulated. They have filed with the city council a petition asking that the license fee be increased from $25 to $50 a year and that an ordinance be passed prohibiting the showing of vile, obscene, suggestive or sensual pictures and films depicting suicides, robberies or holdups. They also want exhibitors to refuse to admit children under five years of age after 8 o'clock at night unless accompanied by their parents.

Members of the Manufacturers' and Jobbers' Club of La Crosse acted as ushers at the Bijou and Lyric Theaters in La Crosse when the 2,600 feet of local pictures were shown. The films were made by the Advance Motion Picture Company of Chicago.

The Empire Theater at Fond-du-Lac, now under the management of F. R. Moquin and F. W. Barbeau, will book vaudeville. The house has been remodeled.

The moving picture show at Hurd's Opera House in Boscobel has been closed while improvements were being made to the house.

Since the warmer weather began and events are being held outdoors which attract big crowds the cameramen have been busy on the local pictures. The Advance Company made a series at Green Bay for Manager H. K. Timm of the Orpheum and the Commercial Club. The Princess, at Kenosha, had a home-made comedy with a hydroaeroplane flight and the Grand Airdome, at Fort Atkinson, showed pictures of all its industries.

VANCOUVER, Wash., may have an anti-noise ordinance which will prohibit any kind of advertising by moving picture exhibitors, that is designed to catch the ear of the downtown crowds.

W. A. Richardson of Miles City, Mont., and others, have formed the Powder River Wild West Shows. They will carry feature moving pictures of the recent roundup at Miles City and give both pictured and actual examples of horsemanship and skill.

Exhibitors at Fairmont, Minn., will not open their houses on Sunday, having no desire to antagonize public sentiment.

Manager Drey of the picture show at Hankinson, N. D., showed the pictures taken in Hankinson by the Minneapolis business men on their trip through the northwest.

Raths & Seavolt of St. Paul, Minn., had an exhibit of moving picture machines suitable for use in school rooms at the convention of the National Education Association in St. Paul.

"It Happened in Joyland," the first scenario ever written and produced in South Dakota, was shown at the Idle Hour Theater in Aberdeen, S. D., recently. It was produced by the Idle Hour Company and acted by Watertown people.

J. M. Totten has sold his interest in the Milo Theater at Little Falls, Minn., to E. J. Enquist of Ortonville, Minn.

Two local companies of militia at Kalispell, Mont., worked to make the production of "The Battle of Gettysburg" at the Empire Theater in that city a success. They shared in the proceeds.

IN THE MIDDLE WEST.

THE race problem is bobbing up persistently in front of exhibitors in the middle west. Four trials have been held in Ypsilanti, Mich., in an effort by negroes to force moving picture managers to grant them privileges with white persons. Albert Renne, manager of the opera house at Ypsilanti, has again been acquitted. His last accuser was Manchester Roper, colored, who declared he was discriminated against on account of his color and refused a downstairs seat. At Danvill, Ill., a negro woman has filed suit for $500 damages against the owner of a moving picture theater there because, on July 3, she says she sought to buy a ticket and was informed that colored persons were not admitted. From San Diego, Cal, there comes word that the colored residents are taking exceptions to the advertising of the Plaza, a moving picture house, which announces that it is "For white people only." A petition signed by fifty negroes was presented to the city council asking that the theater be prohibited from advertising in what they call this offensive manner.

Sankey H. Randall, who has had considerable experience in the moving picture business, and Fred Mygrant, who has been pianist at the Lyceum, have leased the Tuttle Opera House at Columbia, City, Ind., and will give moving picture shows at five cents every night, except Saturday. Their house has a seating capacity of 400.

The Lyric Theater at Fort Wayne, Ind., has ordered a new $5,000 pipe organ from the Bennet Organ Company of Rock Island, Ill.

ILLINOIS.

THE expected "moving picture censorship plank in the platform of Roger C. Sullivan, Democratic candidate for the United States Senatorship from Illinois, has made its appearance. The Chicago gas and biscuit magnate has announced that he will favor the federal regulation of films. It is probable the films of Sullivan, which were made by the Industrial Moving Picture Company of Chicago, will be used in downstate theaters as a part of the campaign.

The American Theater, George Dissinger, manager, at East St. Louis, has taken over the scheme which was worked by the Majestic Theater now closed. Tickets given out by the East St. Louis merchants will be honored by the American.

There is no need to let the regular advertising space in the newspaper go to waste while the house is closed for repairs. The Bijou Theater at Monmouth now and then reported just what progress was being made and kept the interest alive for the re-opening.

A moving picture show has been opened in Beamer's Hall at Laura. Shows will be given each Thursday night.

Manager Windt, of the Opera House at Dundee, has adopted a weekly program for advertising his moving picture shows.

The Capitol Theater at Springfield is now issuing a program. The house is also co-operating with merchants in a ticket distribution plan.

The committee of business men at Villa Grive who are giving free moving picture shows in the streets each Monday and Friday night, divided the contract for furnishing the service between Blair & Clausen of the Airdome and Morrison Brothers of the Lyric Theater. They will alternate in projecting the pictures.

Managers of theaters and newspaper representatives were the guests of Mrs. Conrad Streiwing of the Crystal Theater, at Decatur, for a special showing of the first of "The Million Dollar Mystery."

Managers in Carmi did not hold to the ten-cent admission and patrons were soon again able to see three reels for five cents.

Manager Hurley of the Main Theater at Carmi has been conducting a baby show contest. He also has been working with a local paper which gave four tickets to the theater with every dollar paid on back subscriptions.

Robert T. La Grille and his partner, William T. Middleton, of the Grand Theater, at Sterling, recently were at Decorah, Ia., where it is said they were investigating a new picture and vaudeville house, in the course of construction, with a view to taking a lease on it.

The Princess Theater at Gibson City is making special arrangements to take care of the kiddies at the Saturday afternoon show if the parents are unable to go along.

A special bid for the patronage of unescorted women and children is made by the Elite Theater at Galesburg.

Construction of the new Opera House at Hillsboro, to be conducted by Ed Fellis, has begun.

Seating only 300 persons, the new Empress Theater, which has been opened at Galesburg by Huff & Sullivan, must go after the business on the plea of coziness and excellent projection. They prepared for this by handsomely decorating the little house and installing modern equipment.

Robert and A. J. Weilk have purchased the Princess Theater at Rochelle from their brother Edward, who will remove to Chicago.

Mrs. M. F. Felix is now sole owner of the moving picture shows in Cuba, having purchased the Smith & Blankenburg Theater. The Bell and Airdome Theaters will be closed on Monday and Tuesday evenings during the hot weather.

"The Million Dollar Mystery" is making a hit at the Princess Theater in Springfield. The first business was so good that on the days when the serial is to be shown the house will open at 11 a. m. instead of the usual hour.

SAN FRANCISCO.

THE EMPRESS THEATER, Sid Grauman manager, will install an additional balcony of steel and concrete at an estimated cost of $7,000, the contracts to be let in the immediate future.

The Sherman theater, at Twenty-second and Mission streets, has compleetly overhauled the equipment of the operating room and has installed two new Simplex machines.

The York theater has made a number of improvements in its operating room and has installed an additional projection machine, a new Motiograph having been selected.

The Golden Gate Film Exchange, Inc., has received word from President Sol Lesser, who is now in New York, to the effect that the California rights for the great Selig production, "The Spoilers" has been secured.

A. R. Moore of Porterville, Cal., whose opera house at that place was destroyed by fire recently, was in San Francisco this week making arrangements for rebuilding the house. It is esmated that this will represent an investment of $25,000. Mr. Moore recently disposed of the Wigwam airdome, and is thus out of the moving picture business for the time being.

The Gadfrey-Stow Co. has been appointed official cinematographers for the Panama-Pacific International Exposition and has opened offices in the Exposition Building at Pine and Battery streets.

The National Film Producing Company, formerly located at 111 Turk street, has removed to the Hirsch-Kaiser Building on Post street, where larger quarters have been secured.

A number of substantial improvements are being made at Bennett's Victoria theater on Sixteenth street, near Mission, the work including the construction of a new ticket booth.

Some unusual moving pictures of heavy blasts were taken recently by Edward H. Kemp, Commercial Building, for the Trojan Powder Company, which will use them for advertising purposes. One of the blasts contained seventeen tons of powder. Mr. Kemp is now getting in some of the new model Motiograph projection machines, and one is in successful operation at the Tivoli.

The California Camera Club, Commercial Building, held a benefit outing and barbeque at Mission San Jose on July 19, to swell the fund for the restoration of historic old Mission San Jose de Guadalupe. Many motion picture cameramen were in attendance.

Moving pictures of the great automobile parade held recently under the auspices of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition were shown this week at the Empress theater and were of more than ordinary local interest.

Nine thousand feet of film taken in the Far North by moving picture operators sent out last spring on the whaling and trading vessel, Herman, are on the way to this city to be developed. In addition to securing some wonderful hunting pictures the rescue of Captain Baldwin and crew of the ill fated Karluk of the Stefannson expedition was recorded. The moving pictures are controlled by H. Liebes & Co., which outfitted the vessel; Edward H. Kemp, who furnished the operator and camera outfit, and Eugene H. Roth, who has the selling rights.

P. J. Hanlon, a well known amusement man of Vallejo, Cal., was here this week and advised that in his house of a seating capacity of 328 "The Million Dollar Mystery" was shown to 1327 persons in one day.

"The Eagle's Mate," a Famous Players picture, has completed a highly successful run at Grauman's Imperial, the house having been filled to capacity regularly in spite of the fact tha this is now the vacation period. This theater is the Mary Pickford house of San Francisco, and the mere announcement of the presentation of a subject in which she appears brings a flood of telephone inquiries for reservations and a display of limousines that would do credit to a playhouse in opera season.

The Gaiety theater has setled down for a long run on "Cabiria," and a record for attendance is expected to be established. This feature will be shown for at least four weeks, and probably for six weeks.

Edward H. Kemp has secured the agency in this territory for the Green film cleaner and now has the machines in stock.

The offices of the Globe Film Exchange, the De Luxe Film Attractions and the Apex Feature Service are now in running order and are very busy. Arrangements have just been made with the Life Photo Film Corporation to take all its releases for the Coast, the "Greyhound" to be the first release, followed by "Northern Lights." These will be handled through the De Luxe Film Attractions department. "Sealed Orders" have been booked for the Princess theater in this city for four days and the "Blue Mouse" is booked for the Tivoli for the week of August 9. A branch office of these exchanges has been established at 802 South Olive street, Los Angeles, under the management of Charles Klopot, formerly with the Golden Gate Film Exchange, and within two weeks another branch will be opened at Seattle, Wash. One copy of "Sealed Orders" has been sold to W. H. Clune, of Los Angeles, who will handle the California territory south of Bakersfield.

Charles C. Moore, president of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition Company, was the guest of honor recently at a banquet given by the engineers of the C. C. Moore Company, of which he is also the head. Moving pictures of scenes on the Exposition grounds were a feature of the entertainment.

The Weed Lumber Company has purchased a late model Motiograph projection machine and has installed this at Weed, Cal., for the benefit of its small army of sawmill employees. The airdome opened there this summer by private interests has been closed.

Plans are being made for the erection of a new theater at Merced, Cal., by a stock company and C. D. Douglass, manager of the Elite theater, has submitted a proposition to lease the house. The theater is to seat 1,000 persons.

Howard Davis making arrangements to erect a two-story concrete theater building at Auburn, Cal.

Sunday closing at Dinuba, Cal., was recently defeated at a special election, the proposed ordinance to close all places of business and amusement on that day being voted down.

Work on a splendid new theater to cost in the neighborhood of $25,000 has been commenced at College and Ashby avenues, Berkeley, Cal., and will be rushed to an early completion. The structure will be located in one of the most exclusive residence districts of the College City and will be of unusually attractive design and fire-proof throughout. The main floor will have a seating capacity of 500, while the balcony will be large enough to accommodate 250 persons. The new house has been leased to Messrs. Beach & Krohn, who conduct the Lorin Photoplay theater with so much success, and under such efficient management it promises to take its place at once as a popular play house. It is planned to show some of the world's film masterpieces in this new theater and arrangements are being made to book "Cabiria," "The Spoilers," "The Christian" and other great attractions. Plans are also being made by these exhibitors to enlarge the capacity of their present house to 1200.

A highly interesting private exhibition of moving pictures was given on the morning of July 14 at the Gaiety theater, San Francisco, under the direction of M. B. Dudley, manager of the Panama-Aero Film Co., which controls among others the series of pictures of the Panama Canal, taken by Ray A. Duhem of this city from the aeroplane of Robert G. Fowler, the well-known California aviator. Great interest is being shown in these pictures through the action of the United States Government, which accuses the cameraman and aviator, together with Riley A. Scott, a writer, and Charles K. Field, a publisher, of violating the statutes prohibiting the photographing or publishing of photographs of Government fortifications.

The exhibition was rendered doubly interesting by the appearance on the stage of Robert G. Fowler, who was introduced by George F. Crosby of the film company. Mr. Fowler gave a splendid talk on the efforts of other aviators to cross the Isthmus and of his preparations for the trip. He told in forceful language of his meeting with Col. Goethals and of securing permission for the flight and for the taking of pictures. The Governor of the Isthmus is quoted as saying "I have never placed any obstacles in the way of other aviators and will place none in yours. We have nothing here to conceal from any one."

Aviator Fowler then paid a glowing tribute to Cameraman Ray A. Duhem and cited several instances where rare courage was shown by the latter. In one case the aeroplane was suddenly forced to seek a landing place on the water and before it could be started it was necessary that the propellor in front be turned. Mr. Duhem showed his mettle by divesting himself of his clothing and plunging into the water and starting the engine. In returning to his seat a shark brushed against him leaving a great welt, but the monster was frightened away by the whirr of the propellor. At another time while over the Culebra cut the aeroplane struck an air pocket and dropped six hundred feet before it could be righted. During this tense space of time Mr. Duhem ground away at his camera and a remarkable picture is the result. Those who now view the film have a taste of the sensation of a fall through space with none of the dangers. Another time the gasoline supply gave out and a picture was taken during the glide to the ground, a unique feature being a view of the propellor in the act of stopping.

The pictures commence with views of the Canal Zone taken six or seven years ago by Edward H. Kemp, and show scenes in some of the leading cities, ruins of old Spanish buildings and work on the old French canal project. Work on the great Gatun and Milaflores locks is shown in detail, as well as the excavating in the Culebra cut. The blowing up of the Gamboa dike is shown, as well as the operation of the gates of the locks and the passage of the first vessel through them.

Then follow the pictures taken from the aeroplane covering the entire canal from the Pacific to the Atlantic side and showing the vast project in practically a completed form. Maps of the Isthmus are shown, together with figures showing the cost of the Canal, the films forming an educational treat of compelling interest. A feature of the pictures that attract special attention, in view of the recent action of the Government, are views of the Naos Islands in the Bay of Panama where the largest guns in the world are to be mounted. Pictures are also shown of Taboga Island with the great disappearing guns that form a portion of the coast defence. M. B. Dudley, of the Panama-Aero Film Co., will leave shortly for the East and expects to exhibit the pictures before the authorities at Washington, D. C.

The four local men who are accused of violating the statues are at liberty on their own recognizance and the preliminary hearing has been postponed at the request of the Government officials until August 10.

CHURCH

MISSOURI.

A COOL wave trickled into Kansas City from the North recently and hammered the temperature down to a point where electric fans were superfluous in motion picture houses. Attendance immediately expanded and exhibitors enjoyed unusually good business as a result. While the cool weather is not likely to last long members of the trade take the attitude that every little bit helps at this season, and all are optimistic over present conditions.

That there are some live, breathing human beings in Kansas was indicated at Pittsburg, when W. H. Daly, an exhibitor of that city, was found not guilty of violation of the Sunday labor law. It took a jury of twelve good men and true exactly five minutes to decide that Mr. Daly had not broken the law in any regard. It was the exhibitor's second trial, the first resulting in a hung jury. The members of the W. C. T. U. and others who were pushing the charges against Mr. Daly and his fellow exhibitors are about ready to drop the various cases which are pending, having reached the conclusion that there is little or no chance of conviction. It was planned for a time to try the cases at Girard, Kan., the county seat, but this line of action also was abandoned. Pittsburg exhibitors probably will continue with Sunday performances, public opinion apparently being strong for the Sabbath exhibitions. Organized labor has proved a potent ally. The 150 employees of the Joplin & Pittsburg railway, an interurban line, are striking, and are spending much of their spare time at the moving picture theaters of Pittsburg and adjacent towns. One or two moving picture houses have been forced to close down because of lack of power as the result of the tie-up of the interurban's facilities. The majority, however, have their own plants, or have made arrangements for current from other sources and are running without inconvenience.

Exhibitors of Topeko, Kan., are planning to operate on Sundays, believing that public sentiment is in favor of, rather than against such a policy. F. C. Smith, of the Best theater, with other exhibitors, is circulating a petition with this end in view. The houses will attempt to run Sunday shows as soon as 5,000 names have been secured. If the local authorities oppose this move, the case will be taken to the lower, and later to the supreme court, which, it is believed, will sustain the validity of Sunday performances, properly conducted. Sunday exhibitions seem to be growing in favor in Kansas, the reaction having come after a reform wave.

E. H. Hill, who recently admitted the youngsters of Arkansas City, Kan., to his theater where a hundred dead flies were presented, created another furore among the kids when he announced that each boy or girl who cleaned his back yard would be admitted to a matinee without charge. A cleanup campaign never before seen in Arkansas City resulted. Three hundred boys took advantage of the offer, presenting letters from their mothers to prove their contention that they had cleaned the yards thoroughly and well. Moving pictures of the enthusiasts were taken in front of the theater before the performance.

July 18 was Balie Waggener's birthday. This statement means a great deal to exhibitors and children of Atchison, Kan., where Mr. Waggener has played fairy godfather to the kiddies on his birthday for a good many years. On the recent occasion, the philanthropist, who is in poor health, was confined to his home by orders of his physicians. This made no difference as far as the youngsters were concerned, however. Mr. Waggener had leased every moving picture house in Atchison and the children were admitted without charge.

"Home, Sweet Home," played the Royal theater, in Kansas City, four days, instead of the usual two, as the result of scores of requests from patrons of the house. The film was remarkable in a good many respects, it was conceded. A feature from a mechanical viewpoint, was the handling of a scene showing two racing horses, the picture being taken from the side of the road, and the trees being shown flying by. Appropriate music accompanied the film at the Royal and aided in its success.

K. C. Beck, owner of an amusement park at Hutchinson, Kan., also is county sheriff.

REASON WHY

Simplex

is the most popular projector

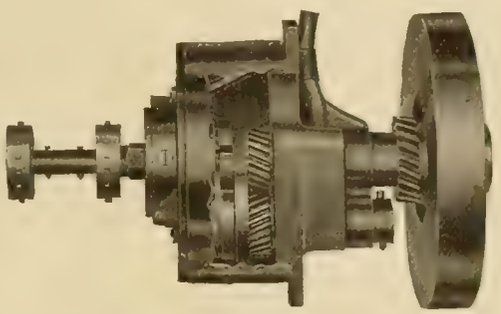
TALK NO. 1

Intermittent Movement

The intermittent movement is the most vital point in a motion picture projector, therefore it is the first feature of the machine which we will discuss in these weekly talks.

It is a well known fact that the intermittent sprocket must be started and stopped sixteen times or more each second. Whenever it starts, it pulls down three-quarters of an inch of film and then must stop dead still. The least movement or quiver is fatal to a steady picture.

To suddenly start or stop a rapidly moving body requires great power and means much strain on the parts employed. The circumference of the Simplex intermittent sprocket travels three-quarters of an inch in one sixty-fourth of a second, or at the rate of 2880 ft. per minute, thus giving some idea of what it means to bring it to an instant stop.



To reduce the strain and vibration to a minimum, it is necessary, first, to make the parts as light as possible consistent with good mechanical principles; and second, to keep the circumferences of the rotating parts near the center of rotation, so as to reduce the peripheral speed and the consequent strain of stopping it dead still.

A glance at the cut will show that the intermittently moving parts of the Simplex carry out these principles and are made so accurately (correct to 1-10000 inch) that we obtain snug fit without undue friction or wear, practically noiseless action and no vibration or back lash. The shape and size of the intermittent sprocket teeth also have much to do with the steadiness of the picture.

DO NOT CONFUSE the cam and star or Geneva movement as used in the Simplex with similar movements of other makes of machines. The principle may be the same, but the distinctly Simplex method of design and accuracy accounts for the great difference in results.

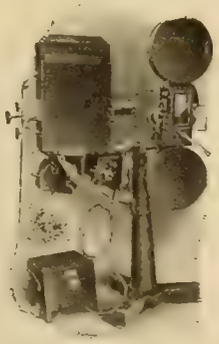
WE CAN PROVE that the intermittent movement as employed in the Simplex projector excels in

Steadiness of picture at fast as well as slow speed.

Ease on sprocket holes of film.

Elimination of rapid wear.

Ease of adjustment and replacement.



DO YOU KNOW that the entire intermittent case, as shown by the cut, can be removed from the machine in 30 seconds, by taking out two screws and loosening two others. It can be put back in the same length of time.

This is only one reason why this remarkable machine has sprung into general use all over the world and is most heartily recommended by all exhibitors and operators who have used it.

Other reasons will be given to you, Mr. Exhibitor and Mr. Operator, but don't wait for them. Write now for our latest Catalog A, which tells all about it.

The unique situation of the county sheriff staging a moving picture exhibition on Sunday and being arrested by city officials, was thus encompassed. Mr. Beck installed a projecting machine on an island and ran the pictures off, the audience viewing the screen from what ordinarily is the back. Mr. Peck argues that inasmuch as the island is navigable, it is government property, and not a possession of the city. While the performance was a success financially, the city authorities announced they would not allow future shows. Mr. Beck refused to submit to arrest, but later gave himself up. His brother, John Beck, superintendent of the park, also was arrested. The police court judge who tried the case withheld decision.

Paul A. Englers, for the past six months manager of the Kansas City branch of the Mutual Film Corporation, has terminated his connection with that company, and joined the General Film Company, as special representative in the South. He will be succeeded by Marty Williams, who recently decided to return to the exchange business, after planning to enter other lines. Mr. Englers is deservedly popular in Kansas City and news of his change occasioned much regret. Headquarters will be at Dallas, Tex. From that center, he will cover practically the entire South as special representative and assistant district manager. Mr. Williams, the new Mutual manager, has had a good many years' experience in the exchange end of the moving picture industry, and is familiar with conditions in both Kansas City and the Southwest.

The Alamo theater, operated jointly by the Standard Amusement Company and the Richlyn Amusement Company, recently closed its doors. The house may be re-opened in the fall. It is located at Thirty-fourth and Main streets, and is one of the handsomest theaters in the residential district of Kansas City, boasting of a canopy containing hundreds of electric globes.

Girl ushers are being used successfully by Joseph Stiebel, manager of the Apollo theater, at Thirty-Second and Trost. Mr. Stiefel presented the Eclectic feature, "The Stain," to his patrons recently and reaped a harvest with the gripping picture. MURRAY.

IOWA.

THE Majestic moving picture theater at Fort Dodge has changed ownership. It was owned by Bert Smiley and Charles Carter, but was put up at auction, being bid in by Smiley for $2,000. Later Smiley sold it to H. J. Lego, an automobile man, and Thomas L. Murphy, of the Plymouth Clay Produ ts Company of Fort Dodge. The new owners planned to take advantage of the hot weather lull July 15 to August 15 by closing the house for a number of improvements.

It is reported Oelwin will have a fourth moving picture house, to be located in the new building being erected by G. H. Phillips.

A new opera house, costing $5,000, is to be erected at Oto. G. W. Burkhead, architect, of Sioux City, drew the plans for a two-story, 40x100, brick structure.

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

DETROIT.

BUSINESS in Detroit is holding up wonderfully well for this time of year, and especially when taking into consideration the extreme warm weather.

A company is being promoted by Detroit capitalists to erect a first class moving picture theater in Walkerville, Ontario, which is directly across the river from Detroit. It will be known as the Garden Theater Company, Ltd., of Ontario, and will build a theater to cost not less than $25,000. The company will be composed of H. E. Walker, Major S. C. Robinson, U. G. Reaume, L. F. Murphy, all of Walkerville, and Forbes Robertson and F. M. Delano of Detroit. A site has been secured on Wyandotte street, and it is the intention of the company to make the house similar to the Garden in Detroit. The services of C. Howard Crane of Detroit have been secured. The theater will have a seating capacity of 600. There will be 12 boxes, four in front and eight at the rear of the house, with a mezzanine circle. The company will probably incorporate for about $40,000. The Castle Theater Company of Detroit has been incorporated for $10,000 to operate the new Castle theater on Hastings street, which will be completed in a few weeks. The principal stockholders are David Rosenthal and Nathan Schreiber, both of whom are also the principal stockholders in the Circle theater on Hastings street.

Motion pictures will be used by Chase S. Osborne, who is a candidate for Governor of Michigan on the Republican ticket. Everywhere that he talks and everything that enters into the campaign will be photographed by a moving picture camera. With it he will have "canned" speeches so that where he is unable to appear throughout the stat· he will use the pictures and a talking machine. It is, of course, proposed that this means of publicity will only be necessary in the smaller towns.

A new theater to be known as the Rosebud will be opened early in August on Gratiot avenue, near Beaubien street. It will seat 450 persons and be an up-to-date and modern playhouse. Bert Williams, manager of the Woodward theater, will also manage the Rosebud, which is owned by H. S. Koppin, real estate and automobile manufacturer.

SMITH.

ST. LOUIS.

THE DATES of the municipal moving picture shows to be given in the parks and public playgrounds have been changed by Park Commissioner Davis in order to prevent conflicting dates with the free band concerts. Free moving pictures are shown every night of the week at one of the following places: Carr Square, Pontiac Square, Lyon Park, St. Louis Place, Mullanphy Square, Lafayette Park, Yeatman Square, Desoto Place, Dakota Park and Pine street playgrounds. The free pictures are proving a decided hit and are attended by large and enthusiastic crowds.

R. T. Edwards, promoter of the Times Movie Review, a current events film, has organized a moving picture and magazine publicity scheme, which he is working through the American Magazine Association, to increase the circulation of the various magazines controlled by the association. The plan includes the nomination of popularity candidates throughout the state. Managers of moving picture theaters in all towns will announce the contest with slides and the winning candidate will be featured in a film which will be taken of the town. Votes will be secured through subscriptions for the magazines.

The Paris Airdome gave a very successful benefit for a Woodmen Circle woman's lodge on July 20th. This was one of several benefits A. Wittman, manager of the Paris, has given this summer, and the events have materially increased his patronage in the neighborhood.

Before they printed the last installment of "Lucile Love," the St. Louis Times began printing "The Million Dollar Mystery." The interest the story is creating should increase the size of the audiences of the theaters running the feature.

The Broadway theater, Broadway and St. Charles street, after using an all feature program for several weeks, has gone back to the Mutual program and will feature Keystone comedies. GIEBLER.

OHIO.

CHARGES that liquor interests are exerting their influence to prevent film theaters from showing "John Barleycorn" before the vote on the state-wide prohibition next November were made at a meeting of temperance leaders to the censor board at Columbus. The board ordered the drinking scenes in the film cut to a "flash." Temperance organization and church people approve the film and protest that the board's order would mean mutilation of the whole story and moral. In filing their protest with the censor board a committee, consisting of Wayne B. Wheeler, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League; the Rev. W. H. Miller, pastor of a Columbus Methodist church, and Mrs. Lillian Burt, president of the Columbus branch of the W. C. T. U., intimated that they would carry their case to Governor Cox unless the board reconsidered its order. Despite the approval of church and temperance organizations the censor board ordered the drinking scenes cut on the theory that their effect on children would be unwholesome. The committee's charge that liberals are attempting to suppress the film because they fear its effect on public sentiment angered Mrs. Mary Murray Miller, one of the three members. She declared no pressure had been brought on her. E. K. Gordon, representing the company which produced the film, replied that he could show the copy of a letter from the representative of a certain liberal organization in which the producers were offered $25,000 if it would withhold the film for six months in Ohio and a number of other states in which prohibition is being agitated.

The Oliver Motion Picture Supply Company received the contract to equip the new theater under construction in East 9th street, Cleveland.

Two of the four picture houses in Findlay have changed owners. The Royal, formerly owned by I. E. Wright, and the Victory, owned by C. H. Mergenthaler of Fosteria, were sold to W. T. Huber, of Tiffin. Mr. Huber has just sold the Sigma theater at Tiffin and will move to Findlay. The Victory was taken over by Mr. Mergenthaler the first of January by Mr. Wright. The latter has owned the Royal for about three years. At one time Mr. Wright and Mr. Huber were partners in the Luna and Majestic theaters at Fostoria.

Edward S. Chanel, of Toledo, is running the Monroe Garden theater in that city and the outdoor effect has won wide patronage.

Ceylon Strong of Wooster is giving Creston its first real picture theater. His house seats about 200, and he is running mixed programs. George L. Kettler is his operator.

The "Wanderlust" overtook Cleveland theaters for a week. "Rolling Down to Rio" carried Metropolitan audiences down to South America by means of a Burton Holmes travelette. "The Rise and Fall of Bulgaria" was offered at the Star. Glimpses of darkest Africa with the hunting of big game by Paul J. Rainey attracted audiences to the Hippodrome. The Opera House presented feature films and "A Mexican Spy in America" was shown at the Alhambra.

Manager Emery is following the Sunday concert policy and Maurice Spitalmy has been leading the orchestra.

The Family theater at Salem is conducting a coupon contest with a little auto truck and a Ben Hur racer as prizes.

The Gilger management donated that pretty little Norwalk theater for the Children's Home entertainment last week and a musical program was given.

The Grand theater at Zanesville has inaugurated a "magazine day" on which occasions every woman patron is given literature and magazines concerning their favorite players.

Common Pleas Judge Frank E. Stevens has appointed Aaron H. Skall, 1857 East 53d street, Cleveland, as receiver for the Grand theater, East 9th street and Eagle avenue. He is authorized either to operate the theater or lease it. The appointment of receiver resulted from a suit to collect rent. RARIDAN.

IN THE SOUTHWEST.

THE banishment of a negro from the city is a peculiar scene in some pictures made at Alva, Okla., for a boosting proposition. The town is proud of the fact that a negro is not allowed to light there and in the film a colored man was given the hose by the fire department, ducked in a tank of water and chased out of town.

The management of the International Dry Farming Congress, to be held at Wi h.ta, Kan., made a contract with the Kansas Motion Pic.ure Company of Wichita to film every week the events leading up to the congress itself. Kansas theaters will get a chance at these pictures.

A three-reel feature dealing with the San Francisco earthquake was shown at the Grand Theater at Carson City, Nev., when a benefit show for the local band was given.

C. H. Russell, secretary of the Oklahoma-Panama Exposition Commission, has decided to have the Southwestern Normal School and the town of Weatherford put into pictures and the reels shown in Oklahoma houses before they make their trip to the fair.

"Leave your fans at home" warns the Hippodrome Theater, at Corsicana, Tex., instead of giving a description of its cooling system.

The local pictures "A Romance of Lovers' Lane," were held over two days by request at the Colonial Theater in St. Joseph, Mo.

"ALL FOR A TOOTH" (August 10).—It all started when Samanthy had a new tooth put into her mouth. Unfortunately, it was a little loose in the setting, but as Samanthy did not know this, there was no cloud on her horizon whatsoever. When she went into town to do some shopping, Samanthy decided, in a properly wifely fashion, to buy her husband a present. Accordingly, she bought him a beautiful calabash pipe, which had been reduced from four dollars to twenty-nine cents. After that she bought him a book dealing with the Catacombs in Rome. Finally she bought herself a box of caramels.

On her way home on the train, she opened the box of caramels and helped herself to a piece. This move was distinctly a feux pas. For the candy was hard and gummy, and Samanthy's tooth, as we have hinted, was far from firm. Her feelings when the tooth came out in the candy, transcend all our poor efforts at rhetorical description. So troubled was she by the accident, however, that she left the beautiful calabash pipe in her seat on the train.

Arriving home, she filled Cy's ears with lamentations over her unfortunate mischance. Cy, wearied at length, took the book she had bought him and retired to the porch. The first picture Cy saw in the book was a view of the Catacombs showing a weird and awful assortment of skulls and bones. As he was reading the ghastly particulars, he fell asleep and dreamed that he and Samanthy were walking about in just such a place as he had seen in the picture. After he had dropped candle grease in his eye, and had been severely bitten by an enraged skeleton, Cy succeeded in extracting a large tooth from one of the skulls. This tooth he thoughtfully placed in Samanthy's mouth.

It was several sizes too large for her, and she didn't like it at all. Cy, himself, did not care very much for the general effect of it, and when he shrank away from the bitterly complaining Samanthy, he was very glad to wake up and find that she was sitting beside him with no awful tusk in the place of the missing tooth.

"ANDY LEARNS TO SWIM" (Ninth of the Andy Series—August 12).—Andy had all of a small boy's natural antipathy for water. His idea of a thorough toilet was to dip one finger into a pitcher, and then to rub it briskly with a towel. His mother naturally did her best to correct Andy's unsanitary instincts in this direction, but without a great deal of success. Andy's natural horror of water was intensified by a drop of water he saw under the microscope of a sidewalk exhibitor. The mere thought that the wriggly horrors he had seen might touch him affected him so strongly that he decided to get along with as little as possible to drink, let alone allowing any of the noxious fluid to touch his face and hands.

But when he was sent on an errand to Coney Island, on a very hot day, the sight of the cool breakers was too much for Andy's resolution. When a young lady of Andy's own age remarked that the water was fine, and that he had better come in, he rushed to the bath house, got a bathing suit and a few minutes later was having the time of his life in the breakers. When he got home that evening, his mother was much impressed by his inexplicable cleanliness. His first swim at Coney Island had a tremendous effect on Andy. He entirely lost his dread of the water. Every spare moment found him with a crowd of extremely scantily-clad urchins, practicing the various intricacies of diving, the trudgeon and the crawl.

One unfortunate day, Andy's sister discovered Andy in swimming, and promptly went and told her mother. The vials of parental wrath were immediately spilled on Andy's devoted head, but while he was attempting to escape his mother, an accident occurred which changed the entire complexion of affairs. A little girl slipped and fell overboard. She was on the point of drowning when Andy gallantly dived in and rescued her. So, of course, he escaped a whipping, and once again found himself in the proud position of a hero.

"THE ONE WHO LOVED HIM BEST (Special Two Parts Drama.—Colin Kean had two daughters. Florence, the elder, was a shallow, scheming girl filled with a great and all-comprehensive selfishness. Julia, the younger, was made of finer stuff. When Colin, one day, asked his daughters which of them loved him the better, Florence immediately professed her own undying affection for her father in terms of exaggerated endearment. Julia said nothing. Colin at once jumped at the conclusion that Florence loved him and that Julia did not. So, when he made his will, he left all his money to Florence, stating that he felt confident that she would always take care of her sister.

When Derrick Webb asked Florence to marry him, he nearly broke Julia's heart. She had always cared a great deal for Derrick, and had always cherished the fond illusion that he cared for her. Shortly afterwards Colin had a stroke of apoplexy. Florence came upon her father lying apparently dead on the shore. After the first moment of horror, she was unable to repress the words of satisfaction which rose to her lips, "Now I shall have all the money."

The old man, reviving at the moment, heard her, and instantly realized how much he had been mistaken. After he had been helped back to the house, he attempted to change his will, but died just as his hand was reaching for the pen. So Florence inherited the estate after all, but Derrick, discovering that he also had made a mistake, married Julia. A year or two later, misfortunes had brought Derrick and Julia to a condition of extreme poverty. When Julia begged Florence for help, the elder sister laughed. The ghost of old Colin relieved them of their difficulty by causing a window shade to fall. When Derrick climbed on the old chair, which was the only remembrance of her father Florence had allowed Julia to keep, the bottom fell out of it. In the debris Derrick and Julia found the bills and gold watch which Colin had secreted there before he died.

"WHILE THE TIDE WAS RISING" (August 15).—Fred Bowers, a fisherman, is going out to the fishing grounds in his motor boat one morning when he sees an aeroplane in trouble. The aeroplane falls into the water, and Fred, going to its assistance, saves George Almy, the aviator, from drowning. Almy repays his rescuer by proceeding to fall in love with the girl Fred intends to marry. Ruth, the girl in question, is at first unable to make up her mind, but Almy's polished manner and suave ways soon begin to have an effect, and she finally decided to elope with him.

Fred, in his motor boat, sees them starting out in another boat, and follows them. Almy, discovering that they are followed, puts on all speed in an attempt to escape, but finding that it is useless, puts Ruth in a deserted shack on the shore, and with her wraps still in his boat, sets out again with the idea of leading Fred astray far down the coast, and then of landing and making his way back to Ruth by automobile. Fred, seeing Ruth's wraps in Almy's boat, believes she is still there, and follows. Finally, after a desperate chase, he overhauls the ex-aviator. A terrific fight ensues in which the brawny fisherman is eventually victorious.

Meanwhile, Ruth, shut in the shack, discovers that the tide is beginning to overflow the floor. As time passes, the water grows higher and higher. She is boxed in like a rat in a trap with no possibility of escape. Fred finally succeeds in forcing Almy to confess where he has left the girl. Overcome with horror at the realization of what the rising tide will do, he bends every effort to get to the shack in time. He gets there just as Ruth has given up all hope, and rescues her from the hungry waters. Needless to say, Ruth realizes that she has made a mistake, accepts Fred, and dismisses the ungrateful Almy from her affections.

THE RAJAH'S VOW (Special—Two Parts—August 10).—With his dying breath, the Maharajah compels his young son, the Rajah Lal Chahda, to vow to exterminate the family of Sir Edward Thomas, the man who stole his favorite wife and gave him his death wound. Years later the Rajah, who has come to England, learns that Mae, daughter of Sir Edward, is about to wed Lieutenant Fitzhugh. Remembering his vow, the Hindoo sends Sir Edward a dagger. The Englishman and his Oriental wife are terrified upon receiving the death message. Mae and her husband leave for India. The following morning all England is stirred by the mysterious murder of Sir and Lady Edward.

The Rajah returns to India. As time passes, brooding over his vow unsettles the man's mind. It seems to him as though the spirit of his father were bidding him to complete his work by slaying Mae. One of his men, disguised as a servant, attempts to poison the girl, but the plot is discovered in the nick of time. A second attempt is made when a deadly cobra is hidden in the room where Mae's infant son is at play. The father discovers the child's awful peril and shoots the reptile just as it is about to strike. Enraged at the frustration of his plans, the Rajah determines to slay Mae with his own hands.

Calling upon the woman, he informs her of his purpose. As he raises his arm to strike, Mae pleads for her life. The thought of killing a defenseless woman stays his hand and the Rajah departs. That night, at a feast given by him, it seems to his disordered mind as though his father's spirit were bidding him to expiate his failure to fulfill the vow. Emptying a vial of poison into his winecup, the Rajah proposes a toast to his approaching death. Raising his cup in full view of his horrified guests, Lal Chahda quaffs the deadly draught.

OLD MAN HIGGENBOTHAM'S DAUGHTER (August 11).—Jared Higgenbotham, an ardent advocate of temperance, sees Alec, his prospective son-in-law, taking a drink. He orders his daughter Matty to break her engagement. Upon her refusal, the girl is told to choose between her father and her sweetheart. Matty defies her father and marries Alec. Although passionately devoted to his daughter, the old man is too stubborn to forgive her. Matty and Alec purchase a farm in an adjoining county. Later, every spot on the old place reminding him of his daughter, Higgenbotham sells his farm and prepares to move.

With the birth of her child, Matty is filled with intense longing to see her parents. Alec accedes to her request and sets out with Matty and their child on a visit to the old home. During the journey Alec stops at a stream to fill his water jug. A sudden attack of vertico causes him to fall into the water. The swiftly-running stream carries him along. Worried by her husband's absence, Matty leaves her child in the buckboard and searches for him. The shattered jug at the water's edge tells of what has befallen Alec. Half crazed with fear, Matty runs down the stream in an effort to find him.

Two girls, out fishing, discover Alec in the nick of time. The stricken man is carried to a house nearby. Matty finds her husband just as he is restored to consciousness. Remembering she had left her child alone in the wagon, Matty hastens back to the spot, but finds the buckboard gone. Meanwhile, the Higgenbothams come upon the wagon and discover the child. Ignorant of the fact that it is their grandchild, they make their way to the nearest house. There they find Alec and Matty, who are frantic with fear. In the surprise and happiness which follows, a reconciliation is effected.

AT THE END OF THE ROPE (Special—Two Parts—August 12).—Manning, his infant daughter, and Pete are the sole survivors of an Indian attack upon the settlement. In the flight of the three the child is wounded on the wrist. The fugitives come upon a lost mine. Impelled by greed, Pete strikes Manning across the head in an attempt to slay him. The Indians come upon the half breed imediately afterward. Pete takes refuge in the mouth of the mine and meets a miserable fate when the entrance is sealed. Believing Manning dead, the redskins take his child with them. The girl is adopted by Chief Brown Bear.

Twenty years later, an insane white man roams about the hills. Spring Breeze, the chief's daughter, comes upon him when he injures his leg. Filled with pity, the maid takes him to her people. Mexican prospectors who enter the camp, learn that the old man has several gold nuggets in his possession. They entice him from camp and torture the man to make him reveal where he found the gold. Discovering the old man's absence, Spring Breeze gives the alarm. The chief and his warriors later find him in the Mexicans' power. In the fight that ensues, one of the Mexicans falls. His companion, however, makes his escape after viciously striking the old man over the head.

Chief Brown Bear pursues the prospector and takes a short cut to intercept him. Meanwhile, his mind restored by the blow, the old man recalls the past and in Spring Breeze discovers his daughter. The chief sees the Mexican loop his lariat about a boulder and endeavor to slide to a ledge below. When half way down, the Mexican finds that his rope is twelve feet short. About to drop to the ledge, he discovers Chief Brown Bear waiting for him with knife uplifted.

A SUBSTITUTE FOR PANTS (August 14).—Billy and Sammy, rivals in politics, are also rivals in love. Billy, however, is favored by Kitty, the object of their affections. Coming upon his rival in close confab with Kitty, Sammy attempts to butt in. A lusty kick delivered by Billy, shoots Sammy out into the road. The man collides with Carr, Kitty's father. Learning the cause of the trouble, Carr chases Billy. The ranch owner orders his daughter to marry Sammy. The girl has a mind of her own, however, and flatly refuses. A compromise is affected when Kitty promises to marry the man who wins out at the coming election.

Billy, candidate on the suffragette ticket, is favored by the ladies. Sammy, on the Bull Goose ticket, realizes Billy's popularity with the fair sex is liable to mean defeat for himself. The man thereupon plots to kidnap his rival on the morning of the election. His scheme is successful. Billy is spirited away and after his trousers are appropriated, is locked in a barn five miles from town.

Kitty has witnessed the kidnapping. Learning of her sweetheart's predicament, she throws her divided riding-skirt into the barn and bids him don them and dash back before the polls open. Clad in the divided skirts, Billy mounts Kitty's horse and dashes for the town while his sweetheart hides in the hay. In the midst of a speech denouncing his rival, Sammy sees Billy coming. The polls are about to open when Billy, mounting the veranda of the building, boldly makes a bid for the feminine vote. In fact, he announces that his sympathies are so strong for the suffragettes that he has donned split skirts.

Billy is elected by a overwhelming majority. After donning trousers, the boy returns to the barn and throws the skirt toward the pile of hay in which Kitty is concealed. Meanwhile, bowed down with woe, Sammy endeavors to drown his sorrow in the flowing bowl.

NEAR DEATH'S DOOR (August 15).—Upon learning that his daughter Helen has secretly married Charles Dwyer, Ford, a self-made man, declares that the boy must prove his metal before he can claim Helen. Charles consents and goes to work in the Ford construction camp, up in the hills. Charles discovers that Anna, camp waitress, bears a striking resemblance to Helen. Jack, a foreman, loves Anna. The man becomes intensely jealous of Charles. Anna attempts to explain, but Jack declines to listen to her. In anger, the waitress does her utmost to increase his jealousy. The quarrel is patched up, however, when the two meet upon the mountainside shortly afterward.

Unknown to Jack and Anna, preparations have been made to blast the side of the hill above them. Just as the immense charge of dynamite is about to be exploded, Charles sees their danger. Shouting a warning to his assistant, the boy plunges to inform Jack and Anna of their peril. Jack watches Charles approach with a scowl. The foreman aims a blow at him. Charles dodges and then knocks Jack down. A terrific explosion rends the air. Hurling Anna to the ground, the boy throws himself atop of her to shield her from the avalanche of earth and stone which rushes down the hillside.

Ford and Helen have motored out to see the blast. Just as the earth is hurled skyward, Charles' assistant arrives upon the scene and tells of what has occurred. A rescue party is rushed to the spot indicated. Ford and Helen, filled with dread, accompany the men. Shoveling furiously, the rescue party come upon the victims in the nick of time. Hours later, when Charles regains consciousness, the smile on Helen's face and the grip of Ford's hand tell him he has won his spurs.

"THROUGH LIFE'S WINDOW" (August 10).—Shy and diffident, wealthy Arthur Chester has often longed for love, but has never met his ideal. Mrs. Harcourt, a not over-wealthy society woman, desires to make a rich match for her daughter, Helen, who is engaged against her mother's will, to Lieutenant Tresham. The South Africa War breaks out and Tresham goes to the front. Some months afterwards he is reported killed. Chester meets Helen, falls in love with her and, with the aid of Mr. Mintoe, a friend of the Harcourt's, carries on an ardent courtship. Helen at first refuses him, but at last yields to the wishes of her mother and marries Chester. A year afterwards Tresham, who has only been wounded, turns up, begs Helen for a last meeting, which she grants. She tells Tresham she loves him and always will, but will remain true to her husband and vows. Their conversation is overheard by Chester, and his love for Helen is so great that he resolves to free her that she may be happy with Tresham. Leaving evidences of having destroyed himself, he disguises himself and disappears. Later, he hears of Helen's marriage to Tresham, and is happy in the knowledge that she is happy. After a lapse of five years, warned by his doctor his heart is in bad condition, Chester is seized with a desire to see Helen once more. He visits his old home, sees her through the open doorway with her husband and child, and as he is leaving is stricken with heart failure. They discover him and he has just strength to kiss Helen's child and give them his blessing.

"DAVID GARRICK" (Special—Two Parts—August 11).—At the theater, Ada Ingot watches enraptured, the acting of David Garrick in Romeo and Juliet. He notices the girl in the audience, and after the play, fascinated by her beauty, watches her leave the theater, accompanied by every evidence of wealth and social position. With a sigh, he realizes she is not for him. Ada's father discovers her infatuation for Garrick, and insists she put him out of her mind, as he wishes her to marry her cousin, Chivy. Ingot then promises Garrick a large sum if he will leave that part of the country. The actor coldly refuses, then says, "Invite me to dinner with your friends and I will endeavor to cure your daughter of this fascination." At the dinner, Ada is shocked to note Garrick's boisterous behavior and the fact that he is apparently drinking excessively She speaks pleadingly to him and Garrick nearly loses his control, but manages to go on with the despicable part, although his heart urges him to tell Ada the truth. At last the ordeal is over and Garrick returns home tired and heartsick, leaving Ada miserable and her father regretting the whole affair. Later in the evening, Smith, one of the dinner guests, tells Ingot he just saw Garrick and that the actor was not intoxicated in the least. Ingot shame-facedly admits the truth and he and Ada hasten to Garrick's home to make amends. In appreciation of the actor's sterling qualities, Ingot says, "Mr. Garrick will you do me the honor of accepting my daughter for your wife?" As Ada and Garrick clasp each other in their arms, Chivy enters and almost faints at the sight.

Fifth Avenue Fake Stores

I copy in part the following from an editorial in a New York paper:

"Thanks to the activities of the Fifth Avenue Association, we have witnessed the elimination of many swindlers who have been conducting bankrupt, fire and auction sales—of course, it is the desire to get something for nothing that leads the shopper into the traps set by these store keepers; but the swindlers are always so bare-faced that it is difficult to see how a person of average intelligence could be hoodwinked so readily. The time has NOT come for dollars to be sold at ten cents apiece. Economy lies in getting the best possible value for one's money, but economy can not be better practised than by patronizing the shops of the reputable merchants who tell the truth about their wares they offer for sale."

Say! Mr. M. P. Man, how does this strike you?—even in this large city, where every purchaser is supposed to be smart and wide-awake there are fakers on this swellest business avenue in New York—have a care where you place your confidence. When you are away out from the supply stores your chances of getting stung are twice as great—it costs you no more to do business with HALLBERG and then you are sure that you will get the right goods at the best price.

"THE NEW STENOGRAPHER" (August 12).—The firm of Brown and Robinson, real estate dealers, advertise for a new stenographer. Lucille Montgomery, a scrawny old maid, but an expert worker, replies, and is engaged. Her employers and Cutey, their clerk, admire her work, but they question whether it repays them for having to continually look at her awful face. One morning she fails to appear, and sends her niece, Lillian, with a note, explaining that the girl will make a capable substitute. As the niece is an absolute and radiant beauty, as well as being a wonderful stenographer, joy reigns supreme in the office, and immediately Mr. Brown invites her out to lunch. Robinson, his partner, proclaims his sincere admiration, and showers attentions upon the girl. Cutey, the clerk, also becomes very busy in the adoration line, causing considerable jealousy. Secretly all three men hope that something will happen to prevent Lucille from ever returning to the office. The fascinating stenographer does not reciprocate any of the love-making, a fact which puzzles the three greatly. Some time later, a weazen, sawed-off, funny-looking specimen of manhood enters and asks for the new stenographer. When she appears, the freakish-looking individual opens his arms, the beautiful typewriting queen madly rushes into them, and then she introduces the little fellow to the three business men as her husband. They faint dead away. After their recovery, Lucille, of the funny-face, enters and endeavors to soothe the broken hearts of the disappointed lovers. Her face restores them to norman mentality, and after the departure of Lillian and her husband, the three men feel even Lucille's face is a great blessing in disguise as they fully realize they will be immune from her wiles.

"THE HORSE THIEF (August 13).—With a bunch of other cowboys, Jack Raynor is traveling the range on a fence-repairing expedition. They stop to repair a broken section, and in the course of their labors, an old quarrel breaks out between Jack and another cowboy called "The Sullen One." During the fight, Banks, a foreigner, in the country only a short time, approaches the group, and seeing the cowboy's fresh mounts, takes Jack's horse, leaves his own exhausted animal in its place, and resumes his journey at full speed. The boys are all so absorbed that no one notices the incident until they return to their horses. Then, catching sight of the fugitive in the distance, all give chase, and the man is stopped with a lariat in a very effective manner. The foreigner begins to realize he is in serious trouble, for the crime of horse-stealing is one of the worst offenses a man can be guilty of in that section. The boys find the sheriff is away, and the spirit of the wilder West still being extant, the cry of "Lynch the horse thief" goes up. Banks is accordingly led away volubly protesting he did not take the horse with the intention of stealing it. Fortunately for him, Sally, the sheriff's daughter, learning of the boys' intentions, arrives on the spot in time to prevent the lynching. She questions the frightened man, who explains that he was in urgent need of a doctor and that was why he had taken such desperate measures. She also learns the reason of his haste, and convincing the boys a doctor is needed at once, all dash off to town. The physician is escorted to Banks' cabin just in time to welcome an addition to the Banks family. In partial atonement for their error and hasty action, the boys take up a collection among themselves, and present it to the happy father.

"POLISHING UP" (August 14).—Personal criticism is the cause of a severe quarrel between Bunny and Flora, his wife, and both, unknown to each other, decide to "polish up" their manners and appearance. John "dolls up" in silk hat, cane, etc., and while out walking, flirts with two pretty girls, Maude and Belle, who invite him down to Orange Beach on the following day. Greatly to his delight, his wife informs him she is going to visit her sister, although she really intends to visit Orange Beach to "polish up" a bit, acquire the latest fashions, etc. The following day John goes to the beach and takes Room 17 at the hotel. He meets Maude and Belle and they indicate that their room is just across the hall. Meantime, Flora arrives and registers under the name of "Evangeline Gray" in room No. 16. She sprains her ankle. The doctor attending her pats her hand soothingly and she coquettes with him. She becomes acquainted with Maude and Belle and all swap confidences concerning the "Old Dear in the next room", and the "Nice young Doctor." The girls suggest they have a little supper party with "Evangeline," and the doctor, so that evening, Bunny, with his arms around the two girls, enters Room 16 and confronts Flora, whose hand is being affectionately petted by the doctor. Flora keels over in a faint while John sinks into a chair, exclaiming, "My Wife!"

For a while serious trouble is threatened, but at last the confusion subsides. Flora and Bunny deciding it "is Six of One and Half a Dozen of the Other," begin to see the humor of the situation. He suggests they have the party just the same, and proposes a toast to their new friends.

"THE WHEAT AND THE TARES" (Special—Two Parts—August 15).—In a game of cards, Stillwell, a young Southerner, incurs the hatred of Collins, an unscrupulous scoundrel. Seeing a chance for a double revenge, Collins goes to LaVinge, father of Edith, with whom Stillwell is in love, and demands payment of an old gambling debt. The old man has not the money, and Collins, by threats and cajolery, induces him to agree to give him his daughter in marriage, thereby cancelling his indebtedness. Edith, although disliking Collins, consents to marry him for her father's sake. Later, Stillwell is accused of killing old LaVinge, and Collins, on the witness stand, testifies he saw Stillwel strike the fatal blow. Stillwell is found guilty and sentenced. Now that her father is gone, Edith pays up his debt by turning the plantation over to Collins and refusing absolutely to marry him. While in prison Stillwell, receiving letters from home, gets the idea of writing the Uncle Eben series of stories, which become very popular. Black Bart, a road agent, the man responsible for old LaVinge's death, is hounded by the law. He finds protection in Edith's home temporarily, and learns from her Stillwell is serving sentence for a crime which he committed. Bart leaves his hiding place, is seen and fatally shot by the officers. Dying, he confesses to the killing of old LaVinge. Stillwell is at once freed, and in disguise returns to his old haunts, where he plays a game of cards with Collins, and wins the plantation back from him. He then reveals his identity and has Collins arrested for perjury. Stillwell and Edith are married and live quietly on the beautiful old Southern plantation over which there had been so much contention.

WILLIE (Special—Two Parts—August 10).—Willie Clark is in love. His girl, Jane Fetherly thinks a great deal of him also. Willie, whose training has made him a home boy and a mama's pet, fears the loud voice and stentorian tones of Jane's father. Jane urges Willie to take the fatal step and speak to her father, which Willie finally does under protest. Jane's father gives Willie the laugh, intimating that Jane requires a "man" for a husband instead of a "Willie boy." Willie becomes dejected, and upon returning home, finds Jim Rucker, a Texas cattleman, on a visit to his father.

Willie asks Rucker for a job on the cattle ranch, and Jim, having in mind the necessity for entertaining his cowboys at times, thinks it a dandy idea, and engages Willie. Willie departs for Texas, taking with him all the boudoir necessities, including a powder-puff, scent bottle, manicuring outfit, etc. Willie wears a monocle attached to a ribbon, and thinks this to be as necessary a part of his equipment as his hat which, by the way, is a Broadway production, such as cowboys have never seen. The arrival of Jim Rucker and Willie is hailed most heartily by the boys, who at once see visions of sport during the long evenings, with Willie in the leading role. Life for Willie on the "Flying U" ranch becomes an unceasing round of gaiety, with Willie unanimously elected as the "goat." Outside his window in the evening they watch him perform his twilight toilet with powder-puff and manicure outfit. They put up jobs on him, so that when he climbs into his bunk the bottom falls out. As he is scenting his pajamas with toilet water, ready for retiring for the night, they ruthlessly lasso him and drag him out into the moonlight where a violent tossing in a blanket leaves him groaning and bemoaning his unfortunate fate. Night after night his friends, the cowpunchers, awaken him with war dances and blood-curdling yells. They shoot out his lamp; likewise shoot off the neck of his ink bottle. Willie feels despondent and wants to go home. He makes no pretense at being happy, but the friendly cowpunchers of the "Flying U" ranch do not want to lose Willie. He is too good a thing to let go, so they continue to utilize their combined ingenuity, making Willie's life not worth living.

Willie is finally introduced to a lantern-jawed, Roman-nosed, flea-bitten horse, which makes no secret of its intense delight for Willie, on the spot. Willie tries to ride him, but the horse is determined he shall not. The restlessness of the horse is abetted by the actions of the cowboys, so that the brute finally runs away and lands Willie on his back in the corral. The enthusiasm of the cowboys increases with their successes in making Willie's life miserable. There seems to be very little work done on the ranch, except the entertaining of Willie. Jim Rucker does not officially recognize the baiting of Willie, but keeps out of the way, so as not to interfere.

The horsemanship exercises of Willie are screams. The cowboys pretend to help him, but irritate his horse and make it perform antics which drive Willie into a frenzy of terror. Willie tries to run away from his tormentors, but they lasso him and drag him back. He wants to obtain a closer view of the cattle, so one of his tormentors drags him at the end of a lariat through the herd and into a pond where Willie splashes and splutters and narrowly escapes from drowning. Then the worm turns. The cook is the first one to receive the brunt of Willie's displeasure. Willie pounces on him, pushes his head into a flour basin and treats him violently. Willie accumulates a pair of "6-guns" and starts on a rampage. He huddles the punchers together and makes them dance and do acrobatic stunts. He chases them around like a flock of hens. He has everybody on the ranch on the run. They develop bursts of speed which would be a credit to a marathon. Willie loses his eye-glass, and his pink complexion assumes a deep brown hue. His carefully preserved toilet preparations are thrown out of the window. Everybody on the ranch jumps sideways when Willie comes into view. In a short time he is the boss of the job. Willie completes his career of conquest by ducking the punchers, one by one, in a horse trough. Rucker, who has evaded responsibility in the affair, is treated to a short dose of a popular medicine by Willie until he begs for mercy. From a "lah-de-dah" Willie, the hero of the picture becomes transposed into a weather-beaten, muscular cowpuncher; so that Jim Rucker finally wires back to the Clark home, as follows:

"The kid is O. K. He has licked every puncher on the ranch; he has borrowed money enough from me to buy a hundred head of cattle and starts east tomorrow to marry the girl. Don't keep him long; we need him out here."

There is rejoicing by Willie's father, who goes to confer with Jane's pa. Willie comes back home a different young man, and his people are proud of him, while Jane likes him better than ever. So they are married.

NAN'S VICTORY (August 15).—Jack Haldane, a clever young artist, but without wealth, is desperately in love with Irma Keith. Irma is the spoiled darling of indulgent parents and a society queen. The admiration of her many suitors has turned her head. She plays the part of a coquette in society, and few realize that beneath her veneer of selfishness, she possesses a woman's heart. She tells Jack she will not marry a poor man; so he determines to go away to the seashore where he will not be tormented by the sight of her beautiful but coquettish self. Jack departs, and at the seaside meets Nan, a fishermaid, who assists her father with his nets. Jack goes with them on their fishing trips and becomes interested in a friendly way in pretty Nan, who proceeds to fall in love with Jack.

Irma misses Jack, and tires of the flattery and homage of her admirers. Her better nature asserts itself and she realizes her unjust treatment of Jack. She suddenly awakens to a sense of her deep love for Jack, and impulsively decides to follow him to the fishing village. She finds Jack in the company of Nan, who is innocently forgotten by Jack in his joy at again seeing Irma. Nan's heart is torn by jealousy as she witnesses the joyous companionship of Jack and Irma. When she sees them in a loving embrace, her jealousy turns to frenzy, and she resolves that Irma shall not take Jack away from her. The hotel in which Jack lives and in which Irma is stopping, catches fire at night. There is great excitement in the village and the entire building is apparently doomed to destruction. The limited fire-fighting facilities of the village are of no avail against the raging conflagration. One by one the guests stagger out through the smoke and flames, and finally Jack makes his appearance. Nan is among the spectators and is greatly relieved at his escape. Jack, however, immediately looks about in search of Irma and not finding her, declares heroically that he will re-enter the blazing hotel and rescue her. The men believe this would be suicidal, as the whole interior seems to be a mass of fire. They restrain Jack, who struggles violently to escape. Nan bravely rushes into the burning building and saves Irma, realizing that her great love for Jack would rather see him the husband of her rival, than that he should be forever be unhappy through having lost his sweetheart.

"MELLER DRAMMER" (August 14).—Goldie, the bright young daughter of Farmer Meadows, is engaged to marry Harold Montaine, a romantic young farm hand. Along comes Jim Bludsoe, a regular villain, whose polish and citified manners impress Goldie so that she is induced to elope with him. Harold is heartbroken, while farmer Meadows turns his daughter's picture to the wall. Harold swears vengeance and after a hearty meal, starts on the trail of the villain.

Two years later Goldie is living with her infant child in abject poverty in a western mining town. Jim illtreats her, and tears up the marriage certificate which he throws out of the window. However, Dennis Casey, the low comedian, saves the pieces. Tom Dalton, a big-hearted miner, saves Goldie from a beating when Jim tries to indulge in this pastime. In the fight which follows, Jim stabs Tom, and apparently kills him. Jim then goes through a lot of cold-blooded stage business, lights a cigarette and flicks the ashes in the face of the prostrate man, and sets fire to the cabin to destroy evidence of the crime. But Tom is not dead, and the faithful Dennis rescues him.

Harold is at last on Jim's trail. Jim learns of his pursuit and engages Indians to ambush him. Harold with his trusty gun, kills all the Indians and follows this feat by shooting Jim and five other desperadoes with one bullet from his revolver. One stormy night Goldie returns home. Farmer Meadows forgives her after Dennis and Tom arrive and exhibit the marriage certificate. They vouch for her good conduct and when Harold follows them shortly all ends in true melodramatic style with everybody happy.

"THE DAY OF THE DOG" (August 14).—A lively little comedy which tells the story of a cur dog that was given a home through the finding of a stick of dynamite.

THE FAMILY RECORD (August 12).—Daniel Segram, dressed in the garments of a sea captain, and showing evidences of having plenty of money, wanders into a second-hand book store, picks up a family Bible and is shocked to find his own death record written there. The book seller notes his astonishment and they become acquainted. Segram tells his story.

"Jane Collyer and I were both orphans. My employer, Hatch, was in love with Jane, but she accepted me and we were married. The brute discharged me and I was unable to obtain other employment for some time. My wife bought this Bible in which to inscribe our family record. One day I shipped on a vessel bound for the tropics. My wife begged me not to go, but I felt there was nothing else for me to do. Our ship went down in a terrible storm and I was cast away on an uninhabited island. A box of books which washed ashore from the wreck saved me from going insane, as I had something to distract my mind. I discovered that the island waters were a veritable treasure house of fine pearls. For thirty years I read and re-read the old books, lived like a savage, and spent my time in gathering pearls, the finer ones of which I made into a necklace to take home to my wife in case I might be taken off by a ship. Finally I was rescued. On coming back to civilization, I found everything changed. The old landmarks had vanished. The buildings I knew in my childhood were torn down. Where my home stood is an office building. My wife and friends have gone away, and I do not know where to find them. This Bible is the first trace I have found."

The bookseller examines the record of the Bible and sees the recorded marriage of Daniel Segram's wife with Hatch. The name of the clergyman who performed the marriage is also given. Daniel traces his wife through the clergyman, who accompanies him to the poor-house. The old woman is overcome with joy. She explains that Hatch treated her brutally and she obtained a divorce. She had married Hatch to escape starvation. After leaving him, she sold everything, including the Bible, to buy food. Then she was taken into the poor house. Daniel clasps his old love in his arms while a smile shines through his tears. From his pocket he takes the pearl necklace and places it around her neck, and the minister remarries them.

LUBIN.

"HE WANTED WORK" (August 11).—John Jackson is driven from home with a promise that unless he brings some money back he will have his heart carved out. Mandy acts as though she meant it, too. He tries for a couple of jobs, and gets one as a hod carrier on a new building, but the Irish contingent refuse to work with a black man and he is chased away. He stumbles on a suitcase lost by an actor and tries to pawn it, but only succeeds in getting kicked out. The suitcase contains wardrobe and John gets the brilliant idea of making up as an Irishman and getting that hod carrying job after all. Things would have gone nicely had not one of the workman, wetting down the bricks, playfully turned the hose on John as an invitation to a scrap. That washes off the make-up and the deception is exposed. John starts to run but a couple of bricks reach him before he is gone far and presently he is buried under the pile of bricks which has been moved from where it was to where John is by the angry hod carriers.

THE COOK NEXT DOOR (August 11).—Nora, a cook becomes the heiress of a distant relative. By the terms of the will she must live in the testator's house. As the house is in a fashionable district and as it is known that she has been a cook, her reception is mild. A paragraph in the paper gives her a hint and she decides that if they have been looking for a cook she'll give them the sort of cook they have been expecting. Then the people next door decide that she shall be invited to a party where she will be shown up. Nora accepts but her appearance is a surprise to all. The host proposes to her, to the great distress of his two daughters, but she shows that her heart is true to the policeman she is engaged to.

THE DOWNWARD PATH (Special—Two Parts—August 12).—Henry Bliss, a retired millionaire, has a wild son, Warren, whose escapades become so notorious that the Bliss family declares they will give him no money outside of his allowance. Warren, desperate, forces the drawer of his father's table, gets the combination to the library safe, and steals money. "The Rattler," a veteran crook, on a scouting expedition, looks in the library window and sees the boy take the money. "The Rattler" also notes that Warren places the combination card in his pocketbook. The crook follows Warren and sees him enter a gay cafe.

Hurrying to his shabby flat, "The Rattler" finds his daughter, Olga, who assists her father in his crooked deals. He urges Olga to go to the cafe, meet Warren, dazzle him and get a copy of the safe combination from his pocketbook. As the girl is eagerly starting for the cafe, Felix Kirk, a convict who has just completed a term for burglary, comes in. He has decided to get a job and go straight, so that Olga and he can marry. He begs the girl to give up her work. Olga promises to think about it when she has finished this job. The girl goes to the cafe, meets Warren through some friends and by a clever ruse obtains a copy of the safe combination without the knowledge of Warren.

The next evening "The Rattler" enters the Bliss residence and starts to rifle the safe in the library. Father and son come home unexpectedly and "The Rattler" is trapped in the library. Bliss is in a rage over the discovery that Warren has taken money from the safe. During a violent scene, Warren kills his father. "The Rattler," having seen the murder, then attempts to escape. In an exchange of shots between "the Rattler" and Warren, the former is wounded in the leg, but manages to escape from the house and get to his flat. Warren calls the police and tells them that his father was killed in a fight with a burglar they discovered rifling the safe. The next morning, Olga calls Felix from his honest job. "The Rattler" is unable to walk and he must get rid of a box of jewels he took from the safe. Felix is persuaded to take the swag to a "fence." At the "fence" Felix is arrested in a raid, the stolen jewels found on him, and he is accused of the Bliss murder. The shadowgraph is worked in the third degree. Olga and "The Rattler" finally succeed in freeing Felix of the murder charge, and "The Rattler" gives himself up for the robbery. Warren weakens and confesses.

"THE HEART REBELLIOUS" (Special—Two Parts—August 13).—Bart Wendel, a paymaster for the Western Ore Company, leaves his Western surroundings for a vacation. In the city he falls in love with Helen Burns, a young woman who, through the influence of her unscrupulous father, is an adventuress. Pursuing her father's directions, she leads Wendel to believe she intends to marry him, and at the same time accepts large sums of money from the unsuspecting lover. Wendel finds out Helen's intentions. He is a stern, uncompromising man and really being in love with Helen, quickly puts an end to her trickery by carrying her away by force from her apartments and forcing her to live up to her agreement to wed him before he returns West. When he reaches the West he has with him a sullen, resentful wife.

Helen chafes under the domineering methods of the man who has determined to make her conform with his way of thinking. She writes her father telling him of her whereabouts and dropping broad hints that a burglary of the safe in the office, containing a large amount of money, would be very easy to accomplish. Meanwhile Wendel continues to rule Helen with an iron hand, not treating her unkindly but determined to break her stubborn spirit. In the bare little office of the isolated ore company, Helen is virtually a prisoner; she grows more and more desperate and one day she escapes. In her flight through the woods she falls over a cliff and is dangerously wounded. Wendel nurses her back to health. She is so changed by his kindness that gradually shame, remorse and the desire to love succeeds her former selfish, unprincipled traits. Finally they are reconciled and start to live an entirely different life.

One day Helen's father appears at the plant, instead of his former helpmate in dishonesty he finds an entirely changed woman. Helen refuses to give him any assistance in robbing the safe. He angrily shows her the letter she has written him and, using this as a lever, defies her to prevent him carrying out his dishonest intentions. Helen is terrified. She can say nothing to Wendel, because she knows her father would betray her secret and she would lose the love of her husband for good. For two days she remains in a constant state of terror. Then her father, with the assistance of a treacherous employe, enters the office in the dead of the night, covers Wendel with a revolver and proceeds to rob the safe. A desperate struggle ensues and, in order to save her husband's life, Helen drives her father from the place at the point of a gun. Wendel, badly wounded, is tenderly cared for by his devoted wife. Her bravery has convinced him of her loyalty and love and the future opens bright for the happy couple.

"LATIN BLOOD" (August 14).—Gains, an Italian gardener, is an employee on the estate of the rich and beautiful Lucia. His emotional nature makes him fall madly in love with the mistress but his dull brain prevents his realizing how ridiculous his passion really is. Lucia does not suspect this feeling toward her so her kindly disposition leads her to show him slight attentions. Gains has a sister who is devoted to him and, being like himself of low intelligence, believes with him that his infatuation for Lucia is not hopeless. Knowing Lucia's love for flowers Gains carefully selects the choicest blossoms of his own culture and sends them to her. Pleased by this little thoughtful attention, Lucia sends for Gains and thanks him. He misinterprets her motive and decides that the time to make a formal proposal has arrived. He dons his best clothes and starts for the mansion.

Meanwhile Lucia's English fiance, a young nobleman, has arrived at the villa for a visit. Gains arrives at the villa just in time to witness an unmistakable love scene between Lucia and her fiance. Brokenhearted he returns to his humble home where Rosa is waiting for the news. His grief and her disappointment combine to produce an abnormal mental state. She proposes to kill both the lovers but her brother sternly forbids it. Then, unknown to him, she conceives a scheme for ridding her brother of his rival. A hot-blooded admirer of hers, Tony, is chosen as the instrument. She seeks Tony and tells him that an English stranger has insulted her and made an appointment to meet her that night at a summer house on the grounds of the estate. She urges Tony to go in her place and when the Englishman comes, avenge her. This he consents to do and she takes him to the place and conceals him.

Then having ascertained that the Englishman is living at the village hotel she finds a messenger and dispatches him to the hotel with a decoy note signed with the name of Lucia, and asking for a meeting at the summer house. She does not realize that the forgery is too crude to deceive. Her brother has left the house to seek consolation at a drinking place and she decides to send him a note, summoning him to a spot near the ambush, where she has arranged to meet Tony after the assassination, and dispatches this by the same messenger. The messenger, in a befuddled condition, mixed the notes and Gains, receives what he believes is a summons from Lucia. Rosa goes to the appointed place to wait. The Englishman, receiving a cryptic message which puzzles him, goes to solve the mystery and meets Rose. He asks her if she knows anything about the note. She sees that it is the one intended for her brother and slowly the realization of the mistake comes to her. She rushes to the summer house to warn Tony but on the way she meets him slinking out of the grounds. He tells her that she is avenged. As she flies to the summer house she sees that her trap has caught her own brother.

"THE PUNCTURE PROOF SOCK MAN" (August 15).—John Tomkins, the inventor of a puncture proof sock, is so enthusiastic on the subject that he can think and talk of nothing else. While engaged in his office with a customer, he receives a message from his wife requesting him to bring home her new evening gown without fail as she must wear it at a reception she is giving that evening. Tomkins secures the gown but on his way home he meets an acquaintance. He immediately begins to talk socks and by way of demonstration he pulls off his shoes, which he places on the rail of a viaduct and promptly knocks it off in one of his extravagant gestures. The shoe falls on the head of an Italian organ grinder who thinks it was thrown from an office window above. He rushes into the building and goes from office to office, seeking some one with only one shoe. The shoe is tossed about from place to place and Tomkins follows close on its trail but does not overtake it until a tramp finds it and throws it in the water. In the meantime the guests arrive at the Tomkins house and Mrs. Tomkins is on the verge of nervous prostration waiting for her gown. The guests leave in disgust before Tomkins arrives. Mrs. Tomkins has hysterics. Tomkins writes up an ad for his puncture proof sock and puts it on exhibition.

"THEY BOUGHT A BOAT" (August 15).—Jack Burns and Billy Hale buy a motorboat. Having more enthusiasm than nautical knowledge, they invite their friends for a trip. Swelled with the importance of ownership, they invest in gorgeous uniforms and engage a cabin boy who weighs three hundred pounds. They are about to make a trial when the government inspector warns them that they are lacking in necessary equipment, such as life preservers, fire apparatus, fog horns, lights, etc. They buy enough equipment to sink a battle ship and when it is all loaded on the launch with the cabin boy on top it comes near swamping the boat.

They put "out to sea," however, and their friends watch them from the shore. They discover that the boat leaks and a panic ensues. They try to bail the water out with tin cups while the cabin boy puts the pump hose overboard and pumps water into the boat. The water gains rapidly and they yell loudly for help. An old sailor wades out to them to see what is the matter and tells them that they are aground in about ten inches of water and they had better walk ashore. They return to their room wet and disgusted, discard all that savors of nautical atmosphere, and decide to buy a croquet set.

MELIES.

"THE FAMILY OUTING" (August 4).—The Jones' start out on a picnic much against the wishes of father Jones. He realizes only too well what it means when one has twelve children. They hire a cab which is as old as the horse he drives. After all getting into the cab the poor old horse refused to pull, so Father Jones has to get out and walk and also carry the lunch basket, which weighs considerable. A new start is made, then trouble begins in earnest. The shafts of the rig pull out, one of the wheels comes off and after a long walk without using the contents of the lunch basket they return home, where Father Jones is given a severe lecture regarding the unappreciativeness of man.

"EASY COME EASY GO" (August 4).—Two maiden sisters make a bargain with a truckman to move them from one room to another. They do not tell him that their room is on the second and the other room is on the sixteenth floor. The elevator refuses to let the truckman take the furniture up in the car, so he tells the sisters unless they double the price he will move the stuff back again to the second floor which he had brought up to the sixteenth.

In the meantime a new tenant has moved some of his furniture into the second floor room. The truckman having received his increase in pay and not noticing the new furniture starts taking it to the sixteenth floor. The new tenant, believing he is being robbed, calls in the police, who make the truckman cart the pieces back to the second floor and also make him pay $10 to have the piano tuned as they feel his rough handling is responsible for its peculiar tone. The truckman is so disgusted he returns to his cart, putting up a sign, "For Sale, Cheap."

"THE SHIELD OF INNOCENCE" (Special—Two Parts—August 6).—Gilbert Darman loved a rather sporty woman and when he found out her true character and the fact that she was betraying him with another man he killed himself. His twin brother swore to avenge him and when the woman settled down to lead a respectable life with her innocent daughter he set out to win the girl's affections. When the mother discovered his identity his revenge was complete as the girl was dying of love for him and he refused her. In the end her innocence touched him and he returned to her at the mother's prayer. The mother went out into the world to repent her former life.

"A MOTHER'S ERROR" (August 5).—Fifteen years had elapsed since Mrs. Coleman's son had been kidnapped by the family butler, who took this method of revenge for being discharged. John Gilbert, poor and out of work, answered an ad in the paper, which brought him to Mrs. Coleman's home, and he secured the position. He had received the wrong kind of training since childhood and when he saw a safe open the temptation was more than he could resist. Mrs. Coleman caught him in the act and getting a revolver, shot him as he was about to escape. The next day a letter came from the detective agency who had been trying to locate her missing son, stating they had learned he was alive but in very poor circumstances and was using the name John Gilbert. Realizing she had shot her son the mother was heartbroken but the services of a noted physician pulled him through his illness and a happy reunion resulted.

"GRATITUDE" (Special—Two Parts—August 8).—A farmer who owns a very intelligent dog died. His successor, not liking the dog, becomes enraged and shoots him. The dog had become quite attached to the new farmer's little girl and when the latter is kidnapped by a gypsy the dog rescues her and returns her to the parents. The farmer thereupon regrets his past actions and treats the animal kindly ever after.

"ONLY A DREAM" (July 28).—Jerry and Tom, tramps, see a boatcrew out for practice. Jerry had rowed in a college crew in his younger days. They fall asleep and Jerry has a dream in which he again rows in a race which he wins. Suddenly they wake up in the water having been kicked off the pier by a watchman.

"210 VS. 213" (Special—Two Parts—July 30).—Two young men are in love with a beautiful and popular young girl. She favors one but rejects the other. The latter in revenge closes a switch which will cause the locomotive carrying the girl's wounded father to collide with an approaching engine. To prevent the collision the lover lassoes the switch, turns it over and the engine takes the siding, where it runs off the track, crushes into a house and kills the villain.

"A MATRIMONIAL ADVERTISEMENT" (August 7).—A young lady under an assumed name advertises for a husband and the ad is answered by her brother. A meeting is arranged but the latter is unable to keep the appointment and sends a friend of his. It is a case of love at first sight and when the brother learns that the lady is his sister he sees the humor of the situation and blesses the lovers.

BIOGRAPH.

THE MEAL TICKET (August 3).—Colloquially, a "Meal Ticket" describes a means of support and the little show girl was the bread winner for her husky father and brother. When the income of the two was threatened, the brother contrived a scheme, which, strangely enough, resulted in the happiness of all.

THE MAN AND THE MASTER (August 6).—In the strife between capital and labor justice may be submerged in personal prejudice, but through the guidance of say, a higher power, man is brought to regard his fellow as a brother and then is when we find the realization of the true brotherhood of man.

THE DEADLY CHEROOT (August 8).—The cigarmaker fills an order from the "Blow-'Em-Up Society" for a loaded cheroot and a fresh iceman steals the cheroot. ESSANAY.

"TOPSY-TURVY SWEEDIE" August 10).—Mr. Rhyme, a poet, is distracted at his work by the different noises in his home. To cap the climax his aunt arrives, bringing with her all her pets. She also brings "Sweedie," her cook, who insists on fighting, and a general free-for-all battle occurs into which pie throwing and rolling-pin combats enter. Sweedie finally wrecks the place completely, driving the poet from the house and finally taking possession.

"STOPPING THE LIMITED" (August 11).—Hugh McKinnon, a manufacturer, is angry because the R. R. superintendent refuses to stop the limited No. 19 at Bangor. He refuses to allow his daughter, Nancy, to marry Dan Sawyer, so they decide to elope. They start in Dan's auto and break down near the R. R. station. No. 19 has just stopped for water and they jump aboard. McKinnon sees them board the train, and wires the superintendent that passengers have boarded the limited at Bangor. The R. R. official wires back, "Impossible, if what you say is true, will make Bangor regular stop." The irate father is forced to forgive the couple in order to get proof that No. 19 took aboard passengers at Bangor, but he does so and the R. R. is forced to "come across."

"THE FABLE OF THE MANOEUVRES OF JOEL AND FATHER'S SECOND TIME ON EARTH" (August 12).—Old man Suggs was feeling Kippy one day, so his son Joel, a little short of pocket money, persuades him to sign over all his property to him, and relieve the old gent of all the worry, he said. Shortly after, Joel got a hunch that the old Duffer was a nuisance, so sent him to the home for the destitute. The old man lived there for some time, then decided that Joel, the Fox, has sluffed one over on him. He gets a lawyer and finds that his son's attorney left a loop-hole, and the deeds he held were valueless. Old Suggs then cuts loose and paints the town Green. He turns his son out, then gets married and settles down to take life easy. Moral: Bring up your father so he won't be ungrateful.

Mustang Pete, his rival for the hand of Sophie, immediately begins to press suit, and when Slim returns, he finds Sophie and Mustang mounting at his tombstone, which they bought with his insurance money. Thinking Slim a ghost, they flee with Slippery in hot pursuit. Slim never hesitates until he proves that he is really alive, thus defeating the wily Mustang Pete and his evident intentions of taking over his homely widow, "Sophie Clutts."

"BRONCHO BILLY WINS OUT" (August 15).—Broncho Billy and the coward are both in love with the scchool teacher at Snakeville. Broncho is accepted, and the coward, mad with jealousy, induces the unsuspecting rival to carry through a mock hold-up. When Broncho Billy appears as a highwayman, the school teacher shoots at him. The coward has left the crowd and fires at Broncho. The girl is held for shooting her sweetheart, but when the coward appears, she accuses him, and backs up her statement by showing that her gun contained nothing but blank cartridges. The coward is driven across the state line, and Broncho Billy, badly wounded in the shoulder, soon recovers and marries the school teacher.

"A GENTLEMAN OF LEISURE" (Special—Two Parts—August 14).—For three months Smith Ellicott has lived in the town of Waverly. He is liked by all, but the fact that he keeps his business a secret and associates with "Old Man Weaver," a suspected murderer, brings criticism down upon him. In spite of the mystery which seems to surround the young man, he is loved by Dolly Fraser, much to the chagrin of Charley Bratton, one of her most ardent admirers. One day, while out hunting, Bratton sees Ellicott give "Old Man Weaver" some money. Bratton immediately hurries to Dolly with the information that Ellicott has been having transactions with a suspected criminal. Dolly refuses to believe him, despite the circumstances which seem to put Ellicott in the wrong.

The next afternoon, Ellicott meets Phyliss, Dolly's young sister. She climbs a tree for a bird's nest and he leaves her to go home alone, as he has a dinner engagement. Here the plot begins to develop, for Bratton engages a couple of crooks to kidnap Dolly's sister and also to waylay Ellicott, the idea being to make Dolly think her young sister Phyliss has been abducted by Ellicott. After a series of thrilling incidents during which there is a mob scene, "Old Man Weaver" rescues Phyllis from the hands of two ruffians. Ellicott escapes and everything ends happily. The mysterious business of Ellicott is cleared up when it is made known that he and "Old Man Weaver" have discovered a substitute for putty, and the money which Bratton saw pass between them was to finance the deal.

PICTURESQUE GAGRY (SOUTHERN RUSSIA) (August 3).—The architecture of Southern Russia is thoroughly disinctive and the rambling grey stone palace of the Prince of Oldenburg, with its extensive grounds and well-kept drives is a gem that is greatly admired by the tourist. In the great park, quiet even in mid-day, one sees the various shrubs, flowers, trees, etc., of this beautiful country. Gagry is one of the oldest of the Russian provinces and the ruins of its old fortifications fill the spectator with wonder and awe. Not the least of the curious spectacles are the ruins of an old church which dates back to the sixth century.

The Russian takes great delight in the military and the Cossack escort, a fine body of horsemen, is the pride of the Prince of Oldenburg. In the village when the day is done the natives, always lovers of music, take great enjoyment in the National dance called the Lesginka.

THE CIRCUS (July 20).—The villagers and village boob prepare to see the circus which has just arrived in town. While one of the elephants is taking his bath the boob annoys him. Bill, the trainer, warns the boob, but too late—the elephant has taken a quantity of water in his trunk and gives the boob a bath.

The boob tells the manager, who is a rival of Bill for the love of one of the performers. They get into an argument. Bill throws the manager into the water. The manager swears revenge and exits. Bill ties one end of a rope to the elephant's harness and the other end to the lemonade stand outside the circus tent. When the elephant walks off, he pulls down the stand and throws lemonade over the manager.

Meantime the show is going on in the tent. The audience is disgusted and commence to throw rotten vegetables at the performers. Then the fire appears. Everything seems well until he takes a drink out of a bottle which he supposed to be filled with water. His assistant, when filling the bottles, made a mistake and poured gasoline into the bottle. The fire-eater spits the gasoline out. It ignites the flames of hot coals which he uses in his act, setting fire to the stage. The rural fire department arrives and in attempting to put out the fire nearly drown the audience. Bill and the manager are fighting on the stage and as the people run out, they get the water from both sides.

CIRCLE 17 (Two Parts—July 30).—Professor Bartoli has incurred the enmity of a secret Italian society. With his daughter he flees to America. As they start to board the steamer, an agent of the society attacks Bartoli and would have stabbed him, but for the timely interference of Capt. Rawdon, U. S. A.

A year passes. Bartoli has established himself as a music teacher in New York, while Anita has a flower stand on the street. Capt. Rawdon, coming home on furlough to visit his mother and sisters, stops at the flower stand to buy some carnations. He recognizes in Anita the girl whose father he saved in Italy. The girl's gratitude, for she too remembers the incident, pleases the stalwart officer. She gives him one of her father's cards and Rawdon promises to see her again.

Reaching his home, Rawdon is welcomed by his family. His mother deciding to give a musicale in honor of his homecoming, he shows Bartoli's card with the suggestion that the Italian supply the music. The mother agrees, writes a note, to which Rawdon adds a postscript inviting Anita to attend the musicale.

Bartoli receives the note and writes directions to his daughter to follow him to the Rawdons.' He goes out and the Italian agent of Guiseppi Draga, leader of Circle 17, enters and changes the address on Bartoli's note.

In this manner Anita is taken by the society. Bartoli worries that she does not appear at Rawdon's and the Captain at last suggests that they go in search of her. After some time they trace her to a dirty dive and after a hard fight kill the villain and rescue the dark-eyed heroine.

THE HEDGE BETWEEN (August 16).—Ella is the idol of her grouchy old father, who seems bent on keeping her a child. Although she has reached her eighteenth birthday, she is under the continual surveillance of a governess. To add to these galling conditions, her doting old father presents her with a large doll as a birthday gift.

In the house next door, Bob is welcomed home from college by his mother. She is the exact opposite of Ella's father, kind and benevolent and proud of her big, handsome son. After greetings are over, Bob wanders out under the trees to smoke. Ella eludes the vigilance of her governess and goes outside to meditate upon her hard lot. She wanders down to the great hedge which separates her father's home from that of Bob's mother. Looking over the barrier, she catches sight of Bob. He sees her for the first time. It is a case of love at first sight. They chat in a friendly manner until the girl's governess bundles her into the house. Bob tells his mother of the girl.

Another meeting occurs. Bob gives the girl a note just before she is again captured by the persistent governess. This note proves to be a plan for their elopment that night. Ella outwits both her father and the governess and the marriage is performed. The grouchy old father takes Bob's mother to task for what has happened. She endeavors to calm his ire. The "storm" is finally quelled by the sight of the two happy young people approaching. The old folks decide that the other is not so bad after all, and we are led to believe that they follow the example of the young folks.

THERE IS A DESTINY (August 19).—Jack Baldwin, M. D., just graduated, is spending the summer at a sea-side hotel with several of his fraternity friends. Jeanne De Jean and her grandmother live on an island a short distance from the coast. While the old man has a pension, they add to this by selling fish at the hotel across the channel.

One morning Jeanne is seen by Jack and his friends. They admire her beauty. "Sport" Hamlin, one of the party, tries to flirt with the girl. He is cut coldly. On returning to his friends he offers to wager a hundred dollars none of them can do any better than he did Jack, already interested in the girl, takes up the bet. Jack, to carry out his plans, secures a job as a boat man; he believes that his chance with the girl would be better if she thought him in her own station of life. Following this, it is only a matter of a few days before Jacks makes the girl's acquaintance through the grandfather.

Observing Jack's success, "Sport" Hamlin grows envious. After he is knocked down for making an insulting remark to Jack, he goes to the old man and informs him of Jack's deception. Fearing for his grandchild, the fisherman refuses to allow them together again. A week goes by. Jack finds that he loves the girl. The old fisherman is stricken with heart trouble. There is a storm. The girl telephones to the mainland. Jack, with his medicine case strapped to him, swims the channel and revives the old man. Explanations follow, Jack and Jeanne's destinies are fulfilled.

THE BARNSTORMERS (August 14).—A dramatic company, stranded in a small town, owe a large bill at the hotel. The hotel keeper's son has been strongly attracted by the soubrette of the company and they plan to use this fact to their advantage. They offer the boy's parents to take him into their company as an actor if the father will finance them to the next town and cancel their hotel bill. The simple parents are delighted at this proposition. In the next town they have poor success and a great many difficulties. Bills pour in and the hotelkeeper, now box office man, is broke. The trunks of the company are attached, and the old man at last realizes that he is in bad. He breaks with the company and, having no funds, wires home to his wife for money to return. He received an answer telling him and his son that he can walk. They accordingly turn their backs upon their late failure and homeward wind their weary way.

MEMORIES OF YEARS AGO (August 16).—When, after thirty years, Willis returns to the little western mining camp, he finds that things have changed greatly since the bonanza days. In strolling about he comes to an old sycamore tree where, years ago, he and Dolly had carved their names. To him it recalls memories.

He and Dolly were practically engaged when Walter, a gambler and a drunkard, stepped in and won her. They were married. Unable to bear seeing the girl he loved with another, Willis left for another state. Later he learned that the husband had, in a drunken brawl, been killed.

As the memories are recalled to him Willis takes his knife from his pocket, and cuts away his name. A little later, on his way to the station, learning that he has an hour before the train is due, he stops in at a saloon to rest. In the back room, the wine room, he sees a drunken, depraved woman. As he stares at her and she at him, they recognize in each other their childhood sweetheart. Picking up his suitcase, Willis slowly leaves, while Dolly swoons on the table a lady that was.

SOME CROOKS (August 11).—Jimmy, a safe blower, start out to rob a [illegible] in which some jewels have been placed. As he is about to make a getaway Gerald, the Gentleman Crook, enter and force him to disgorge. Gerald is on his way out when Vivian, the beautiful Light-Fingered Lady, make her appearance and takes the spoils from Gerald. As Vivian is making her departure, the owner of the jewels comes on the scene of action and calls a policeman. The policeman, however, proves the greatest crook of all. As he is about to make a cleanup, he is caught by a real guardian of the peace. Each crook accuses the other, with the result that all are sent to jail.

WILLIE'S DISGUISE (August 21).—Willie decides to play a joke on his elders. So he dresses up in Pa's clothes and dons whiskers just like Pa's. In the street he plays a trick on a policeman. When Pa comes along he gets the blame. Pa is sweet on the school teacher, Pearl. Pearl likes Pa, but does not like his whiskers, so Pa cuts them off. Willie keeps his on. One minute Pearl sees Pa with his whiskers on and the next with them off. Pearl nearly loses her mind. Incidentally her jealousy is aroused by seeing the supposed Pa with his arms around Arabella. Willie also causes lots of trouble for Arabella and her suitors. However, Pa catches him and Willie "gets his."

GOLD SEAL.

LUCILLE LOVE, THE GIRL OF MYSTERY (No. 15—Two Parts—July 21).—Hugo Loubeque, the international spy, falls into the trap which heretofore he had used to defeat those who opposed him. Plan as a man will, unforeseen coincidences arise which confound reason and place the work of a lifetime at naught. It happened thus with Loubeque. When Lucille learned that Loubeque was to meet Lieutenant Hadley at his (Loubeque's) home, she at once hastened to the rendezvous herself. As she was the first to arrive, she took a look through the house of so many terrors. When she beheld a picture of Loubeque upon the wall, the thought of all his crimes and the bitter hatred of her father overwhelmed her, and she raised her revolver and fired into the face of the picture.

Even before the echo of the report had died away an amazing thing happened. She saw the floor of a bedroom slowly sink out of sight. Had she not known what had already transpired in that house, she would have been, indeed, confounded. Lucille removed the picture from the wall, and behind it found a switchboard. It was from this board that Loubeque controlled all the traps, staircases and sliding ways and floors of the house. Forthwith she tested every switch. One caused a staircase to disappear, while another caused a desk to sink into the floor. No sooner than she had mastered the system of switches than Lieutenant Hadley arrived. In an instant she laid her plan of action. She informed Hadley that Loubeque was not there, but that he would leave on the Golden State Limited that night. Hadley was satisfied and left.

A few moments later Loubeque arrived to keep his appointment with Hadley. Instead of Hadley he found Lucille. As Loubeque leaned against the desk Lucille pressed the proper button and Loubeque fell through the floor with the heavy desk upon him. While he was still in a stunned condition, Lucille crept into the cellar and removed the documents from his inside pocket. An instant later Loubeque recovered and ran after the girl, but he was just one minute too late. She ran to the mouth of the secret tunnel, and just before Loubeque grasped her in his arms she closed down and locked the iron gate. This was her moment at last. She could laugh and jibe the spy, and he was helpless to harm her. But time had not ceased to be precious. Lucille rushed to the railroad station and caught the outgoing train. Loubeque also arrived, but he was too late. Lucille was gone forever with the papers. Returning to his home, Loubeque told Gibson that Lucille was on her way to Washington with the documents, but Gibson thought the spy was lying to him. Each took a sword, and they decided to settle the argument with blood. In the midst of a terrible duel, however, the house was surrounded by detectives, and Loubeque saw that he must escape while there was yet time. In the instant before the detectives rushed in, Loubeque took a package from his pocket containing Lucille's costly necklace and handed it to Gibson, with instructions to take it to the Secretary of War. A moment later Loubeque disappeared and the floors of the house tumbled into the cellar, trapping those who had come to arrest a spy.

Lucille delivered the documents to the Secretary of War at Washington, and thus saved the name of her father and of her sweetheart, Lieutenant Gibson. Gibson arrived while Lucille was yet with the Secretary. He fell at Lucille's feet and begged her forgiveness for misjudging her, and she was only too willing to re-establish him again in her heart. That night Loubeque wrote in his diary: "My debt of hate toward Sumpter Love is cancelled, for no hate can outlive love in the man who has known Lucille." Loubeque loved Lucille.

THE LOVE VICTORIOUS (Three Parts—July 28).—Facile as a child, lovely as a flower, the woman takes up her journey along the road to life. She is happy in her innocence because she loves and is to marry Good, her life-long companion. One evening, on her way to a store where she is to purchase material for her trousseau, she is accosted by fawning Vice and smiling Lust. But she shrinks from them in terror. She has not yet made the acquaintance of Evil, but is soon to meet him.

As Woman passes the stage door of a theater, Evil and his first lieutenants, slant-eyed Vanity, and a silver-tongued Flattery, are attracted by her freshness, innocence and youth. Through the cunning offices of Flattery, the Woman is enticed into Vanity's dressing-room. There she is arrayed in costly silks and laces, and she sees in herself the fairy princess of her dreams come to life. After the play she is taken to a cafe. She is dazzled with the many lights and the brilliant colors. She is intoxicated with the glamor and the music, and the hot lips of Evil plant a kiss upon her hand. She forgets the existence of Good, her first and true love. Good seeks her out in the cafe and pleads with her to return home to her mother. But the poison in the wine has penetrated her heart and she turns from Good to Evil with a passing smile.

A year elapses. The woman has lost her freshness. She comes to know the meaning of lassitude in the world of plenty. The false feathers have begun to fade. Evil tires of the wornout Woman and bestows his caress upon Youth, the most recent acquisition to his court of tired gayety. The Woman is outraged at being thrown aside, but through the cunning of Flattery she is cast out of the house.

Woman hastens home and learns that her old mother died of a broken heart six months before. Good again appeals to her, but she is blind to his beauty, and again casts him aside. Now she naturally falls in with Lust and Vice. She knows them this time, and allows them to lead her to the underworld. She drinks the cup of depravity to its dregs. In a low dive of the underworld she again meets Youth, who, like herself, has been cast off by Evil. However, the beholdment of Youth in the talons of Lust causes an awakening in the Woman. In the fallen Youth she sees herself; she realizes what a terrible creature she is, and, like the myriad of others before, she decides to take her own life.

At the crucial moment, when she holds the vial of deadly poison to her lips, Good and Evil come upon the scene and battle for her. The advantage is with one and then with the other. She hesitates and leans over the table. Before her is the old family Bible. Her eyes shift from the death-dealing poison to the holy writ. Long forgotten memories of Good return to her. She sees herself not as an angel of the devil, but as a daughter of God. The scales fall from her eyes, and before her Good is kneeling, her old sweetheart. She shrinks from him as though she might contaminate him. But in all forgiveness and sweetness he takes her up in his arms and guides her to the Great Tomorrow.

TREY O' HEARTS (No. 2—Two Parts—August 11).—The second installment shows Alan alone in the woods, lacking food and all equipment. Judith has meanwhile gone to her camp and sent one of her Indian guides to track Alan. Feeling himself followed, Alan gets more and more nervous. Finally he slips over the side of a cliff and falls into the river. Judith, fishing with the second Indian guide, rescues the young man and has him taken to her cabin.

Rose meanwhile receives a note asking her to visit Alan's lawyers. She finds that Alan is overdue and the lawyer is worried. Trine's spy, Marrpbet, tells him of the note and he accuses Rose of dislovalty. When he starts to ring for a servant to confine her, she pushes the helpless man away, rummages through the desk until she finds papers acknowledging Trine's treachery toward Alan and Judith's plan to kill him at Spirit Lake. Rose immediately starts for the North despite her father's angry protest.

Alan has been deep in the ravages of fever and Judith has nursed him with an awakening love and tenderness. She sends one of the guides to a nearby village for quinine. He proceeds to get frightfully drunk and the next morning she goes after him, cutting the one rose on the bush outside and leaving it near Alan's bed.

He awakes, finds himself alone, and gets up weakly. Judith and her guide pass Rose and the trapper with her unknowingly. When the latter arrives at the cabin Alan thanks the mystified girl for nursing him.

Rose has left her trapper to warn her of Judith's approach. He does, and she persuades Alan to launch a canoe and go away with her. They push off as Judith and her Indian run into the clearing. Alan is almost successful in threading the white water when his paddle breaks and he and Rose are dumped out. They make the shore in safety and Judith is about to shoot him when something stops her. Slowly, her face is buried in her hands, she drifts out of sight. Rose, with her quick woman's intuition, guesses that Judith has commenced to love Alan. Together the two start towards civilization, leaving Judith alone with the guides.

HER TWIN BROTHER (August 12).—Josephine Brown, expecting to visit the seaside with her Aunt Helen as chaperone, is disappointed when auntie's quarantine upsets their plans. Having no one else she makes up her mind to be a boy for the time being and go alone. At the hotel where "Joe" goes, there is a gay crowd of young people. The girls think "Joe" too cute for anything, and overwhelm him with attentions. The young men think him a sissy, and try teaching him to be a sport.

"Joe's" troubles begin when "he" falls in love with Fred Stark, one of the popular young men. "Joe" butts in on Fred's flirtations, and the girls resent it. "Joe" manages to conceal "his" feelings until he comes across Fred kissing Minnie Hall. She breaks down and bawls. Being unable to stand the strain, "Joe" decides to leave. A letter from Auntie helps matters. "Joe" writes a note to Fred saying that he is obliged to go home, and commending to his notice his (Joe's) twin sister who is to arrive in a few days. Fred promptly falls a victim to Josephine's charms, and they become engaged. When Fred asks auntie for "Joe's" address, so that he can write and ask him to be best man, the fat is in the fire. Josephine is obliged to confess.

WHAT HAPPENED TO SHULTZ (August 16).—Shultz's wife despaired of curing her hubby of his dreadful drinking habit; that is, until her brother, Chauncie Alcut, an actor, came to visit her unexpectedly. Alcut arrived just before Shultz came home. Alcut is dressed to exactly resemble the tipsy Shultz. He then takes his position behind the frame of the large mirror from which the mirror itself has been removed. When Shultz conceitedly goes to gaze at himself in the mirror, Alcut, his double, greets Shultz with his self-same gestures and characteristics. Then gradually Shultz begins to see in his supposed image changes which he is well aware does not belong to his own personality.

Finally these changes become so awfully different that Shultz well imagines he has the D. T's. In terror he rushes to the bedroom raving. While he is hugging wife another deception is played on him. He suddenly realizes he is hugging a hideous baboon. It does not take him long to forswear all strong drink, and later, he proves that his oath was a hearty one.

NESTOR.

ON RUGGED SHORES (August 4).—Mary, the lighthouse keeper's pretty daughter, is betrothed to Jack, the son of a hardy fisherman. Jack's foster brother, Phil, is none too honorable a fellow and, if the truth were known, he has wronged Carmen Felipe, a little fisher girl. The girl appeals to Phil to marry her, but he throws her aside in scorn. She then appeals to honest Jack, and when he remonstrates with his foster brother he is advised to mind his own business.

One night Mary and Jack agree to meet in a cave near the lighthouse. The same night Phil takes Jack's boat and, with two other rough characters, he engages in smuggling a shipload of goods. While Jack is going to keep his tryst with Mary he is waylaid by Carmen who tells him that her father is intoxicated and is beating her mother. Jack goes to her home and gets matters right there. In the meantime Mary has Jack's boat on the water and concludes that he is not coming to meet her.

The following morning revenue officers make an investigation and, as Jack's boat was seen leaving its moorings, Jack is arrested and charged with smuggling. Carmen knows who the real smugglers are and she appeals to Phil to save his foster brother. Phil refuses and threatens Carmen if she informs on him. Carmen's sense of justice, however, overcomes her fear and she notifies Jack's father that Phil is the guilty party and not Jack. This bit of information is set before the revenue men. Phil and his companions are captured, while Jack is released and hurries to break the good news to Mary.

38 CALIBRE FRIENDSHIP (August 12).—Jack goes into the little mining town to get "grub." A letter is brought by a messenger to Bill, saying that his little girl in the east is dying and begging him to come at once. Bill takes from their cache the sack of gold they have saved. Carefully he divides it and is planning to leave the rest, when he discovers that a Mexican has come up and watched him through the window. Afraid, he takes the center from a loaf of bread, stuffs in the gold and puts back the bread. Then he writes that he is going away, but has no time to explain. Jack comes back. Bill is gone. He cannot understand until he finds the note. He wonders at it. Suddenly a cruel suspicion creeps into his mind. He examines the cache. The gold is all gone. Like a knife in his heart comes the assurance that Bill has taken all the gold. But Bill receives a telegram that the child is better, returns to the house and the truth comes out. Friendship is back again on its pillar.

ECLAIR.

THE PRICE PAID (Two Parts—August 12).—Tim Clancy was a politician. He was a contractor incidentally. He wanted and secured, by breaking down a good man's moral code, the contract to build the new city water system. Specifications called for the best. He put in the cheapest. The impairing of the city's health was the result. But Tim Clancy pays for this piece of crookedness—pays dearly. Also the poor victim suffered. And it is all worked into a story of heart interest—action and a forceful climax.

To the end of securing the contract for the city's new filtering plant and water works, Tim Clancy instructs his confederate, Warren, to offer a bribe to George Austen, an upright young office holder who handles the bids. Austen, who is married and has a child, throws Warren out at the mere suggestion of a bribe.

Clancy searches around for other means to reach Austen. He learns that Austen's wife is a "climber," ambitious and longs for an automobile. Through him a local automobile company visits Mrs. Austen and interests her in one of their machines. In time she prevails upon her husband to buy the car. In order to meet the payment Austen accepts the bribe and awards the contract to Clancy.

Time passes. Through the cheap work and grafting done in the erection of the filtering plant, an epidemic of typhoid fever seizes the city. Orders are issued to drink only bottled waters; the poor suffer as a result of this. Austen is panicstricken and his cup of bitterness is added to when his child drinks the city water and is stricken.

Meanwhile Clancy's automobile has run down a child and his daughter, who has fainted, drinks some of the polluted water.

Austen's child recovers, but is left blind to the vain mother and weak-willed father as their punishment. Clancy's daughter dies and the grafter realizes, only too late, that his dishonest methods have brought the hand of punishment heavily upon his head.

"A PEARL OF GREAT PRICE" (August 16).—George Austen and his wife, after fifteen years of married life, find themselves growing apart. The husband so far forgets his marital vows as to pay attention to another woman. A sale is announced at a leading jewelry store of a wonderful pearl. Both the wife and the woman, with whom Austen is infatuated, covet this gem. Austen buys the pearl and leaves his card with the salesman. Naturally thinking it is for his wife, it is sent to her. Austen returns too late to prevent the serious error. He is frantic with worry. The faithful Mrs. Austen, receiving the pearl, realizes at once what has happened and, shutting her eyes to the tragedy in her life, she forwards the pearl to her husband's object of attention. The woman receives it and is overjoyed. When Austen calls he is dumbfounded to find that the pearl has arrived at its proper destination and the selfishness and shallow love of the woman opens his eyes. A quarrel follows and in a rage she returns the pearl to him. Returning home he presents the jewel to his wife and with bowed head realizes that he has been neglecting a pearl of great price at his own hearth.

BISON.

THE OUBLIETTE (Three Parts—August 15.)—Francois Villon, vagabond, poet and philosopher, and his friend Collin, leave the vagabond camp and start for Paris. En route to that city, Villon's heart is touched at sight of the eviction of an elderly couple from their poor home. Whereupon he empties his own and Collin's purse, pays the Beadle, and then resume their journey. Overcome with the pangs of hunger, they "lift" the purses of a couple of corpulent monks. For this breach of law both Villon and Collin are arrested and thrown into prison. They succeed in overpowering the turnkey and, assisted by Colon, who insists that his friend don the clothes of the turnkey, Villon makes his escape. Collin is tried, convicted and hanged.

At the foot of the gibbet, Villon's farewell to the swinging Collin is interrupted by the entrance of the Chevallier de Soissons. Villon resents the knight's tirade against the corpse of Collin. Fight ensues and the crafty vagabond slays the Knight, using as a weapon a great stone. The rich purse, armor, etc., of de Soissons proves too strong a snare for the impoverished Villon, who quickly changes habilliments with the dead Knight, props the body against the gallows and then continues on his way to Paris.

Phillippa de Annonnay, the fair ward of the Chevallier Bertrand de Pogne, is held prisoner in an inn. Villon chooses this inn wherein to satisfy the cravings of hunger. Here he meets de Poyne Phillips. From her window she sees the entrance of Villon and determines to appeal to the strange knight. An animated discussion between Villon and de Pogne is interrupted by a scream from Phillips. Villon starts to climb the stairs to the gallery of the inn. De Poyne bars the way and a terrific battle with swords ensues. The fight continues up the stairs and toward Phillipe's window, through which the girl reaches as the fight continues on the balcony and stabs de Poyne, who falls to the floor below, dead. Villon conducts Phillipa safely to her castle, then resumes his journey to Paris.

Having dissipated the proceeds of the de Soissons adventure, Villon hies himself to a garret, where he spends his time in courting the muses. Louis XI, the "Prowler," determines to test the loyalty of Villon. To this end, the king hies himself to a dungeon in the bastille, causes the arrest of Villon, then offers that worthy his freedom if he will help overthrow the king. Villon indignantly refuses to purchase his freedom at such a price. Whereupon Louis reveals himself to the poet and presents Villon with a bound copy of his (Villion's) manuscript, which was the first book to be printed in France. Then Louis knights him, bestowing upon Villon the title Chevallier des Loges.

"IN ALL THINGS MODERATION" (Two Parts—August 10).—At the beginning of the play one is taken into the Graham family. There is the mother, a timid creature who leads a life of drudgery; there is the father, David, harsh, overbearing in his religious convictions; there is the three grown children, Mary, Winnie and Tom. And in this family we get the contrasts—the man (in the father) who carries his religion too far and the girl (Winnie) who loves pleasure too much. In the house the father is the dominate figure; in his presence there is constrained silence and the children hate it all, though submitting. Then we are taken into the fields and introduced to Winnie's lover, Harry. That night the three children steal out for an evening's fun, returning, all but Tom, before the father enters the house. Tom has had a glass too much, and when he faces his father there is a dramatic scene in which his father tells him he is going to the devil. A cane is raised—the mother steps in and receives the blow.

Mrs. Graham is suddenly taken sick. Graham, taking the matter lightly, blames her sufferings onto the children. The father finds her, later, instructing the children to always obey their father. He rebukes the children for making a fuss over their mother, sends them to bed and turns down the light. There, in the dark room and alone, the mother passes out of this life, glad that it is ended. TO THE EXHIBITORS: You can be perfectly certain how your patrons will take D. W. GRIFFITH'S MASTERPIECE:

"Home, Sweet Home"

YOU take it—and they'll take it, just as all who have seen it took it

Read what authorities say about it around the country!

The Opinions of the Motion Picture Press:

Louis Reeves Harrison in the New York Moving Picture World writes:

"HOME, SWEET HOME, a Photo-drama of beautiful motive, of exquisite treatment, imbued with the personality of brilliant Griffith."
"An appreciation of genius by genius."
"An enchantment of the screen."

The N. Y. Dramatic Mirror says:

"You will want to see HOME, SWEET HOME because the hand of David W. Griffith is felt in every scene; you will want to see it because of the photography; you will want to see it because never before has a cast of equal strength been gathered together in one picture under such a master hand."

The Opinions of the Great Metropolitan Daily Press:

Victor Watson of the New York American says:

"The master art of the 'Movies' beautifully done."

The New York Herald states:

"Perfect in every detail."

Leading Managerial Opinions:

The Manager of the Strand Theatre, New York City, the most beautifully appointed motion picture theatre in the world, wired:

"The most beautiful picture I ever saw."

Los Angeles, Cal., turned out en masse to see it open Clune's Auditorium and thousands were turned away disappointed.

W. H. Clune of Los Angeles, Cal., wired:

"The most wonderful picture ever shown. My theatre seats over 3000 people at first class prices and we turned them away every day."

Thus, from Coast to Coast, has HOME, SWEET HOME made its appeal to human hearts.

This great picturization of the song that has reached all hearts cannot fail to reach the hearts and minds of your clientele.

To the Exhibitor:

Have you ever had OLD HOME WEEK in your town? Surely you have! Every town has had one some time or other.

Remember how the crowds of people, young and old, came flocking back to the old home nest; some after years of absence? How they jammed your sidewalks overflowing? How your town held more than the streets could hold and how they welled over into the theatres?

Why not hold a HOME, SWEET HOME, week of your own and draw your people back to see it, with D. W. Griffith's famous film HOME, SWEET HOME, as a star attraction?

It is calling people back to their homes all over the country.

The song that reaches all hearts, in photoplay form will force your townspeople's hands to dig down into their pockets for the admission fee at your theatre.

And the same hand that brought you the price of admission will bring forth a handkerchief with which to wipe away the ready tears brought forth by this wonderfully appealing picture play.

Old Home Week will bring them home, but it will take HOME, SWEET HOME, to bring them flocking into your theatre.

passes. The two girls and boy, tired of their father's preaching, decide to enjoy themselves in spite of it all. Then Harry asks for the hand of Winnie. He is refused by the father, who says that she is to marry a man of religion. The pair elope and go to live by themselves. Tom, the son, leaves home under a cloud. The old man disinherits both of them. Mary, who has shouldered the work left by her dead mother, also marries; and thus the old man is left alone with seemingly no one to care whether he lives or dies. Yet when he is sick Mary comes to visit him, only to be rebuffed.

Winnie, in the meantime, is discovering that Harry is a drunkard. After a brutal assault upon her, she goes to her father to be taken in. The father refuses, telling her her place is by her husband's side. Winnie returns; there is a scene in which the husband, crazed with drink, kills the girl. When Mary and her husband enter the house they discover both the husband and the wife dead. Harry ended his own life on the realization of his act, leaving a note to the old man telling him to preach less and practice more. Years passed by and a child blesses the home of Mary and her husband. This child, unknown to the parents, makes the acquaintance of the old father. And this is the beginning of the regeneration of him. Tom returns, now a man and prosperous. Over the grave of his dead sister he meets his father; and for the first time the old man softens. In the end the regeneration of the father is complete and there is a happy reunion all around.

UNIVERSAL IKE.

UNIVERSAL IKE, JR., IN HIS CITY ELOPEMENT (July 28).—Drummer Jones makes his annual trip West. He stays at the Thatch Hotel, run by Louise's mother. Ike is janitor of the hotel. He and Louise are sweethearts. After the trunks are placed in the drummer's room he unpacks his samples. Louise has been watching from her room. When she sees her way clear, she hides herself in the trunk. When Ike returns with the second trunk, Louisa informs him of her plan. Ike is to lock it up, and they are to elope to the city.

All these preparations are made outside of the drummer's door, who overhears the conversation, but pays no attention to it until he hears a disturbance in the office and inquires of its cause. In the meantime Ike has almost forgotten his last order by Louise, "Not to forget her pet goat." Ike gets it and all three mount the train for the city. At the hotel Louise is missed, and her parents are informed by the drummer of what he overheard. They get the sheriff and start in pursuit. On the train Ike, Louise and the goat are getting along fine until approached by the train newsboy. The goat decides to make a cleanup. As a result the boy and Ike get into a fight.

Louise has trouble with a strange man occupying the upper berth. At last everything rights itself and they arrive next morning in the city. A hotel porter thinks that Ike and Louise are coming to his hotel and grabs their suit case. Ike gives chase with a gun. The old folks arrive and continue the chase. The goat gets sick and Louise and Ike start to take it to a hospital. On the way to the station they meet her mother and father and the sheriff. The sheriff claims Ike as his prisoner. Mother takes a hand and knocks the cop down, gets the pair and starts on her way, leaving the cops much the worse for the battle.

"A SUSPENDED CEREMONY" (August 4).—Judge Lynn is a social climber and decides that his daughter, Trixy, shall marry Archibald Tendervery. There is another reason why the Judge is anxious for the match. He utterly despises his daughter's choice of a sweetheart, Jack Weston. The Judge is entertaining Archibald at his summer residence in Lakeside. Notwithstanding the vigilance of Mrs. Lynn, Jack and Trixy continue to meet. The Judge feeling that his wife is not competent to keep her eye on Trixy, sends for his maiden sister. Aunt Sophie arrives and is appointed guardian of Trixy. Trixy despises Archibald and avoids him as much as possible. Buddy and his father, the Judge, go out fishing in a boat. The day is uncomfortably warm and the Judge, after a time, dozes off asleep. Buddy looks around for something to do and decides to play a joke on his father. He gets a hold of the Judge's line and fastens an old boot to the hook. He pulls the line just enough to waken the Judge, who under the impression he has a bite, reels in his line. The Judge looks at the boot and then at Buddy. He puts two and two together with the result that Buddy gets another spanking.

The Judge rows to shore and the first thing that meets his gaze is Trixy and Jack in a love scene. The Judge, already angry, breaks into a passion when he sees the lovers together. He separates them and threatens to blow the head off Jack if he ever finds him on his grounds. There is the usual tears on the part of Trixy, who is marched off to the house and locked in her room. Aunt Sophie receives instructions not to allow Trixy out. The Judge now decides there will be no more fooling; his daughter must marry Archibald Tendervery and at once. Archibald goes and procures a license. The Judge arranged with the local Justice of the Peace to row over to his house that evening and perform the ceremony. In the meantime Buddy to get even with his father, decides to help Jack and Trixy. He carries Jack a note from Trixy, acquainting him with the situation. Jack writes back and tells Trixy to be ready to elope when she gets his signal. He also procures a license but cannot find the Justice of the Peace. He is much worried. That evening he sees the Justice going towards the lake. He overtakes him and the Justice imparts the information he is going to perform a marriage ceremony over at the Judge's. When they get near the landing Jack informs the Justice that he is one of the parties to the ceremony. At the landing he sees Buddy who promises to help him out. Buddy, by intrigue, gets Aunt out of the house and Jack assists Trixy from the room. They reach the boat, Jack showing his license.

Satisfied Patron Factories

EVERY house showing Mutual programme is a satisfied patron factory—turning them out with the "come again" expression that means money to the exhibitor.

Here are some of the reels you have heard about, big helpers in the production of satisfied patrons.

"Blue Pete's Escape" a two reel Reliance drama that shows the fine hand of D. W. Griffith in its direction.

Another from the Majestic Studio, "The Rebellion of Kitty Bell."

The "Izzy" series of screaming comedies help to bring them back.

Here are some more that you will hear successful exhibitors talking about:

"Fatty's Finish" Keystone.

"Blue Knot King of Polo"—a fine Drama from The American.

"The Water Dog" one of Keystone's best.

"The Severed Thong" a stirring two reel Majestic drama, supervised by Griffith.

"Nancy's Husband"—a one Reel Beauty (and a Beauty it is).

"A Red Man's Heart" from the Majestic, and on the way there is the "Romance of the Sawdust Ring," a Domino that will make its mark.

Every one of these is getting money for exhibitors that show the Mutual programme.

"The Million Dollar Mystery," that wonderfully successful Thanhouser series, is being handled through the Mutual, so that once more every Mutual exhibitor has the advantage over his competitors.

misses Trixy. She gives the alarm. The Judge and Archibald start in pursuit, but Jack, the Justice and Trixy are on the lake. Jack, fearing they will be overtaken, tells the Justice to marry them. They stand up and the ceremony begins.

The Judge and Archibald come within talking distance and the Judge tells the Justice he forbids the marriage. The Justice goes right ahead. The Judge stands up in the canoe and shakes his fists at them. The canoe is overturned. The Justice is about to say the words that bind the young lovers when Trixy, afraid her father will be drowned, has Jack throw him a rope. The wedding is interrupted. The Judge is pulled into the boat and the first thing he does is to toss Jack overboard. Jack swims ashore and vows he will get Trixy yet.

AMERICAN.

"THE TRAP" (Two Parts—August 10).—Old Buck Sage and his two grown sons operate a moonshine distillery in the Kentucky mountains. Sage's daughter, Nan, is insulted by her cousin, Hank, who in turn, is thrashed by her brother, Bud. Hank, seeking revenge, writes an anonymous letter to the revenue officers, informing them of Sage's illicit distillery. Allen, a young revenue officer, is sent to locate the still and secure evidence. By impersonating a fugitive law-breaker he gains access to the home of the moonshiner, who offers to shelter him as long as he wishes. They conceal their moonshine operations from him, however, and he is baffled in every attempt to locate the still.

Nan is greatly impressed by the detective and he finally decides to play the part of a lover and, by gaining her affections, obtain the needed information from her. The unsuspecting girl is an easy victim of his plan and full of confidence in him, is soon persuaded to betray the location of the still. He immediately writes to his superiors, informing them of his success and entrusts the letter to a boy to mail. The boy encounters the moonshiners, whose quick suspicions are aroused by the appearance of the letter and they repair to the home of a neighbor woman to have her read it to them. Nan overhears the woman as she reads it aloud. She is heartbroken by the discovery of her lover's perfidy but her grief quickly changes to vindictive hatred and she determines to lure the detective to his death. She makes an appointment with him to meet him in a lonely spot and arranges with her brother Bud to lie in wait and shoot him from ambush. Bud conceals himself near the appointed meeting place and awaits the appearance of Allen.

As the time for the assassination draws near, Nan's savage anger cools and her love for Allen begins to overcome her desire for vengeance. Finally, unable to resist her feelings longer, she dashes madly through the woods to intercept Allen and warn him of the plot. She arrives at the meeting place before him and is instantly shot by Bud, who mistakes her for Allen. Bud returns to his home satisfied that he has killed the detective. Allen shortly after discovers Nan, wounded and in a dying condition. With her dying breath she reiterates her love for him and exacts a promise that he will spare her father and brothers.

Allen is filled with pity, remorse and shame by the unexpected result of his double-dealing. He returns to the city, downcast and regretful, and keeps his promise to the dying girl by informing his superiors that he has been unable to find any evidences of guilt.

"THE BUTTERFLY" (August 12).—Two sisters love the same man. He proposes to the more frivolous one and the older one hides her love. Five years pass, the shallow Marie finds herself bored with domestic life and motherhood.

In the meantime Lydia is deeply attached to the children and still carries her love for the man. He naturally turns to her for sympathy, which he fails to get from his wife, but lavishes an indulgent love upon the pettish Marie. He treats her as a child. Marie, bored with domestic life, feigns illness and the doctors order her to a summer resort. A handsome and unscrupulous man appears upon the scene and attaches himself to Marie. The mild flirtation develops into a serious affair and Lydia, though tempted to let it go, and thus get the love of the man so dear to her, overcomes the temptation. She writes Robert to come for them, giving an excuse that Marie is not well. In the meantime the elopement is foiled and Lydia saves the situation without destroying the trust of the husband. Lydia finds virtue its own reward and weeds out her love for Robert.

LEAVE IT TO SMILEY (July 26).—With the opening performance a fizzle, the members of the Nightingale Light Opera Company are decidedly on their uppers. "Smiley" and the tragedian, however, decide upon a plan whereby they may eat and drink. After the tragedian has finished a thirteen-course dinner in the city's best restaurant, "Smiley" enters and bangs him on the head with a wicked looking club. The tragedian hurries from the restaurant to chase his assailant and incidentally forgets to pay his bill. The same trick is played elsewhere successfully. Finally the tragedian and "Smiley" are discovered by their irate dupes reinforced by two of the village cops. A long chase follows and at the finish "Smiley" and the tragedian get "theirs."

BILL TAKES A LADY OUT TO LUNCH—NEVER AGAIN (August 2).—Bill, the office boy, was about as untidy a young man as one could imagine until Genevieve Reilly, a girl of his own age from another office, attracted his attention. From then on Bill gradually transformed himself into a "reg'l'r dude," as jealous Izzy Katz, a fellow office boy termed him. Bill finally summoned enough courage to ask Genevieve out to lunch. All went merrily until Izzy and some of the other boys poked their heads through the door and began to guy Bill unmercifully. In his anger Bill hurled the dishes and food at his tormentors who promptly "slung" them back. Both Bill and his "lady friend" were ejected, but Bill was somewhat solaced when he discovered that in their excitement the restaurant waiter and cashier forgot to collect for the lunch.

ETHEL'S TEACHER (August 9).—Deacon Titus takes Ethel to the seashore. Hugh, her sweetheart, dons woman's clothes and follows, introducing himself as Ethel's teacher. Ethel's real teacher arrives later and when all go into the water Hugh's deception is discovered. Hugh puts his "female riggin'" in the deacon's bathhouse and goes home in the latter's clothes with Ethel, while the deacon is obliged to put on the discarded lady's costume. He is chased away by the irate merry-makers.

"BILL" (August 10).—Bill, the office boy, wants the boss to get an electric fan so he warms the thermometer up, and makes him think it is very warm. The fan is brought and put in Bill's room by mistake. Jimmy, the electrician, teaches Bill how to gamble with the fan by numbering the blades. The idea works out well, though there is going on in the Boss' office a conference between Trust Magnates, and the Boss would like to know why the fan hasn't arrived. Various other office boys join the little game outside, for nickels, and one loses under what he thinks is fraud. So he goes downstairs and complains to a policeman, who comes upstairs to raid the game. In the meantime, it has ended in so loud an argument that the Boss has come out and found the fan, and taken it into his private office. There the Magnates see the numbers on the blades and Bill is sent for to explain them. He does so, and the Magnates get interested and open a game themselves, to Hadley's disgust, he wanting them to attend to business. At the thick of their game, when they, like the office boys, begin quarrelling, the policeman breaks in and comes near arresting them, being persuaded not to only by Hadley's entreaties and something else. The policeman goes out, mollified, and Bill is made to clean the numbers off the fan, after which business is resumed, and Bill is sent out, to count up his earnings.

A PHYSICAL CULTURE ROMANCE (August 23).—Fay, owing to her unattractiveness, fails to win the boys. Seeing the success with which her sister breaks hearts, she becomes morose and despondent. Later, at school, she makes a confidant of the teacher of physical culture, who takes a personal interest in Fay, and tells her of her unrequited love. The teacher assures Fay that if she will promise to follow her instructions things will be different and her happiness will be complete. Fay starts in to win her goal, and after much patience and perseverance, during which many funny complications arise, she accomplishes her purpose and has the satisfaction of turning the tables on those who at first would have nothing to do with her.

SHORTY AND THE FORTUNE TELLER (Two Parts—August 12).—Shorty is conducting a little drinking bout at the settlement "boosery" when an old Indian fortune teller, Bess, wanders in and proceeds to tell Shorty he is destined for large sums of money and a title. Shorty's head suffers an immediate inflation, and he repulses the ardent but somewhat emphatic advances of Gussie, the Swedish cook at the ranch. Gussie proceeds to throw various household utensils after the retreating Shorty and he is unmercifully "guyed" by his men. Shorty again visits the local "Palace of Chance" and wins large sums of money from the dealer, who, after handing Shorty his wad, announces that the bank is cleaned out. Shorty and his friends proceed on their way, rejoicing.

Meanwhile Carlos, a sinister bandid, and his henchmen rob the stage. On the vehicle are two little girls, Doris and Mildred. Mildred escapes into the bushes and wanders in the woods lost. Doris returns on the looted stage to the settlement. Shorty and his friends are fired upon by the bandits. They retreat and Shorty comes across the little girl. He holds the pass against the attacking bandits while the others leave hurriedly for the settlement and bring the posse. The bandits are repulsed; Carlos is killed, and a reunion takes place between the sisters at the village hotel, Doris hanging around Shorty's neck, much to that gentleman's embarrassment.

THE MYSTERY OF THE HINDU IMAGE (Two Parts—July 26).—John Stafford is unjustly arrested on the eve of his marriage for the murder of an old gentleman whose body was found in his guardian's library. The young man is taken to the penitentiary, but eludes his guards and escapes.

His sweetheart engages a noted detective who finds a small Hindu image in the hand of the dead man. Following this clue the detective learns that the image is symbolical of a Hindu secret sect known as "The Black Adepts." He trails two Hindus and finally arrests them. He finds in their possession the other part of the image in which is secreted a valuable ruby. Young Stafford is recaptured, but is saved from execution when news of the arrest of the Hindus is telegraphed to the penitentiary.

DOWN BY THE SOUNDING SEA (July 28).—Alice, an old beachcomber's daughter, and Bob, a young fisherman living on an island remote from the mainland, discover a man tied to a rough raft floating in the wreckage of a yacht along the shore. The man thus cast up by the sea is taken to the cabin of the old beachcomber, where he recovers. Bob, jealous from the first because of the attentions which Alice bestows upon John Ward, the man from the sea, one day finds them sitting together on the sand and attacks the convalescent stranger. Only the arrival of a ship containing Ward's wife and daughter prevented a tragedy. With Ward safe in his wife's care, however, Bob sees how foolish he has been and together he and his sweetheart stand with their arms entwined, in the last scene of the photoplay, watching Ward and his wife and child sailing away for the mainland.

MOONSHINE MOLLY (Two Parts—August 2).—Molly Boone's father has been sent to prison for twenty years for alleged complicity in the killing of a revenue officer. Uriah Hudson, whom she secretly suspects of having a hand in sending her father to prison, is her persistent suitor. A new school teacher comes to the little Kentucky village and Molly, although a grown woman, becomes one of his pupils. Lawson Keene, the school teacher also becomes Molly's suitor, and Uriah, jealous of him, betrays him into the hands of the moonshiners, declaring that Keene is a revenue officer in disguise. Molly saves Lawson from death. It is proven that the school teacher is not a revenue officer but a Pinkerton detective sent there to apprehend the murderer of the United States marshal. Keene proves that Hudson committed the murder and shortly after Molly's father is released from prison and the young couple are married.

THE TAVERN OF TRAGEDY (August 9).—Jameson, a Northern spy, visits a Southern tavern where he and the tavernkeeper's daughter fall in love with each other. The tavernkeeper plots to murder the spy for the war bounty placed upon his head. His stepdaughter enables Jameson to escape and Jameson induces her to flee from her stepfather's wrath with him.

THE IDIOT (August 4).—There lived in a country an idiot who was very devout, attending church regularly, and singing on all occasions when joy possessed him the old hymn "Halleluiah." He was not of great assistance on the farm. His father would have preferred a strong, healthy lad who could have eased his shoulders of the burdens of his declining years. Likewise his mother would have welcomed a daughter who could have saved her bent back and rheumatic joints from the grind of housework. Therefore, they cuff and elbow the idiotic son about which mistreatments he accepts silently and as a matter of course. He feeds the pigs, goes to the postoffices, loves the woods and is kind to dumb animals.

One day the house catches fire and his mother, choked by smoke, falls in the burning building. The neighbors try ineffectually to extinguish the flames and are forced back by the heat. The father, a coward at heart, hearing his wife's cries, implores the watchers to rescue her, but none respond. The frantic old man then sinks to his knees and asks God to help him. As if in response to his prayers, the idiot, his son, whom he has kicked about, staggers into the flames, rescues his mother, and chanting the familiar hymn, falls dead at her feet.

THE SECOND MRS. ROEBUCK (Two Parts—August 16).—Mabel Mack's mother is deserted by her father and the mother dies. All that Mabel retains of her family history is a group photograph of her father, mother and herself, in a locket which she always wears. Mabel becomes a stenographer for the rich Samuel Roebuck and marries him, becoming a second mother to his little girl, who has learned to love her when visiting her father at the office. The marriage is a bitter blow to Roebuck's sister Katherine, who has been the mistress of the house since the death of his first wife. Previous to the marriage of Roebuck and Mabel, Roebuck had objected to an intimacy between Katherine and an actor named Francis Carryl. He had forbidden Katherine to have anything more to do with Carryl, and as Katherine was dependent on her brother, she has pretended to obey.

After the marriage of Roebuck and Mabel, Katherine seeks in every way to humiliate Mabel on account of her uncultured ways. Mabel learns of Katherine's secret intimacy with Carryl, who desires to marry her on account of her supposed wealth. When Mabel discovers that Carryl is her own father, she realizes what a blow it will be to her husband to have his sister marry such a scoundrel and she interferes, warning Carryl not to carry out his intentions. But Katherine naturally misunderstands the evident recognition of Carryl and Mabel and is filled with jealousy and rage. She repudiates Carryl and telephones for Roebuck for the purpose of exposing his wife's supposed previous relations with Carryl. Roebuck arrives and Carryl is forced, by the group photograph, to acknowledge himself as Mabel's father. Roebuck forgives Mabel. Carryl slinks away and Katherine finding herself whipped humbly bows to the inevitable. Mabel permits her husband to think that it was she who had come to meet Carryl, her father, and that Mabel's only offense had been that she had supposed Mabel was meeting a lover and had sought to expose her. Thus Katherine's intended elopement is kept a secret and she becomes Mabel's friend.

"THE SAVING FLAME" (August 18).—A young fisherman lives in a rude hut by the sea with his young wife. He is a rough lad and thinks only of his day's toil, while she dreams of romance, which her husband, though he loves her, has failed utterly to supply. One day a city man, camping near by, sees the pretty young wife, and talks of love to her, which the lonely girl allows herself to listen to.

The husband returns unexpectedly from a fishing trip, finds her out with the young city man in the moonlight and, following them home unobserved, he sees the wife kissed by the man. In a rage, he forces the city chap out on the sands to fight for his life, first tying his wife to a chair and locking her in so she may not escape his wrath when he finished with the city man.

She, feeling that she will be responsible whichever one kills the other, upsets herself and her chair and overturns the table on which a lighted lamp is placed and sets the shack afire. The two men see the flames before commencing their fight and rush back. The husband tries to get the city man to rescue his wife and the man, turned coward, runs and the husband carries his wife to safety himself. Assured of her innocence of wrong, he resolves to put a little more romance into his life and his wife's in future.

"THE INNER CONSCIENCE" (August 21).—During the period of convalescence from an illness brought on through worry, the neglected wife of a thoughtless, though good-hearted young fisherman, finds herself hopelessly in love with her attending physician, in whom she has discovered an old friend and sweetheart. Having striven in vain to still the feeling that is growing in his heart, the physician stifles his conscience with the thought of her domestic unhappiness, and in an almost unreasoning anger against the man who apparently placed so little value upon her love. Finally, when the fisherman husband is away on a trip, the pair elope in a launch. During the storm which follows, the boat is capsized, and the doctor is finally rescued and revived—by the very man he was about to wrong. The latter, unconscious of the terrible crisis which affairs have reached, questions the doctor concerning the wife's condition. Then the working of the inner conscience became manifest. Rescued by another fishing party, the woman, as a result of her experience, lies at death's door. The tireless efforts of the grateful doctor, alone, can renew the spark of life; and, although the doctor has relinquished the hope in his heart, when he leaves, it is in the full realization that the happiness which has since been denied her would now be here.

THANHOUSER.

"FROM WASH TO WASHINGTON" (July 20).—With her week's wash only half done, Diana drops her work to peruse the Paris fashion magazines. Poring over the beautiful fashions delineated in the highly colored pages of the publications, Diana falls asleep.

She dreams that she is wealthy and a society leader in Washington. Men of national reputation bid for invitations to her thés dansants and eligible young millionaire statesmen and military officers spend most of their time trailing her about. Diana finally wakes up to find that she still has the hardest part of her day's washing before her.

"THE MESSENGER OF DEATH" (Two Parts—July 28).—Jack Tennant, a young English officer stationed with his wife at a post deep in the wilds of India, leaves on a tour of inspection of his district, entrusting his wife to the care of a faithful old sergeant.

While the officer is away Raj, a villainous native chief who has long coveted Tennant's wife, makes an attack on the post. Mrs. Tennant keeps a diary of the siege. Upon Tennant's return he finds his wife, the faithful old sergeant and several of his soldiers dead.

The last entry in Mrs. Tennant's diary seems to indicate that she has killed herself rather than be dishonored, but no powder marks are found upon her body. From the fact that no bullets in Mrs. Tennant's revolver are exploded the physician arrives at the real solution and concludes that the old sergeant had determined to save her from a fate worse than death. The physician keeps his discovery to himself and the young officer's wife is duly buried with all the honors due a heroine.

"THE BUTTERFLY BUG" (August 2).—Professor Notty, the naturalist, attempts to sort out his bugs and other flora and fauna, but his wife, the neighbors the ashman, the children in the attic, the iceman, a housecleaning maid and a boy with a reflecting mirror torment him into a frenzy and he is unable to work. Professor Notty rushes from garret to cellar in his flight to obtain peace and finally runs madly to the local insane asylum and demands admission. He is chased by his family and friends, however, and after he is saved from incarceration is repaid by seeing his tormentors punished.

RELIANCE.

"THE SHERIFF'S PRISONER" (July 29).—John Walsh, a miner, leaves his wife and baby behind on his barren claim, and takes his small store of gold to the settlement where he loses at the gaming table. In a fight which follows, Burns, a cow-puncher, kills Walsh.

Mrs. Walsh attempts to work her dead husband's claim, but in a few weeks breaks down. A doctor who is called in declares that only the transfusion of a healthy person's blood can save Mrs. Walsh's life. Burns, a fugitive, appears and agrees to submit to the operation. While the mob who seek Burns are held off, the doctor proceeds with the transfusion. Mrs. Walsh's life is saved, but Burns, weakened by hunger and exposure, succumbs, happy in having made amends for his crime.

"THE GUNMAN" (Two Parts—August 1).—The owner of the Pitchfork ranch of which Thorne is manager finds that many of his cattle are disappearing. He orders Thorne to get the cattle back or lose his job. Thorne employs Bass, a gunman, to get the thief, whom he hints is Tom Farrell, his sister Mattie's sweetheart. Bass finds Farrell to be a square young fellow and Mattie, despite her rebuffs, an "up and up little gal." Incidentally Bass discovers that Thorne himself, has been stealing his boss's cattle and threatens to expose the rancher unless he makes good the stolen cattle and gives Mattie a piece of property for a wedding present. Thorne complies reluctantly and the gunman acts as best man at the wedding.

"OUR MUTUAL GIRL" (No. 29—August 3).—Margaret has found The Woman with the Red Rose, as bidden to do by Madame Dolores. She has learned the secret that The Woman holds for her. It is fraught with either menace or joy—but which? Only distance and the flight of time can give the proper perspective to that.

And then, while Our Mutual Girl, Mrs. Knickerbocker, Madge Travis, Margaret's friend, and Howard Dunbar, The Man of Mystery, are discussing the excitement of the preceding days while Margaret's quest was on, Our Mutual Girl, with characteristic impulsiveness, abruptly changes the topic of conversation. Water that has gone over the dam, ever has been uninteresting to Margaret. Barring her artistic standards, she is a post-futurist in action.

She had met Lieut. John C. Porte, who will try to fly across the Atlantic in his huge airboat, in the early Winter. And now, as the hydro-aeroplane rapidly nears completion, the New York newspapers are filled with stories of this remarkable undertaking. Margaret, ever an omnivorous reader of the day's news, sees a story of Lieutenant Porte's trying-out flights.

Instantly she makes up her mind to go up in The America. And, the idea once implanted in her swift, fertile brain, action rapidly follows. She broaches the subject to her aunt. Mrs. Knickerbocker remonstrates. Miss Travis objects. Dunbar teases, and foolishly adds to Margaret's determination to go up by wagering with her that she will not fly.

720 SCHILLER BLDG., CHICAGO

And that night Margaret leaves her aunt's Fifth avenue house, to go alone to Hammondsport. Early the next morning she reaches the aeroplane factory of Glenn Curtiss and, a few minutes later, she is away in a wonderful-down-the-wind flight in The America with Porte, the first and thus far the only woman who has gone aloft in the trans-Atlantic flier.

Elated with her success she returns that night to Mrs. Knickerbocker's house and collects her wager from the astounded Dunbar.

"IZZY AND HIS RIVAL" (August 5).—Izzy and Chester are rivals for Nellie's hand. Nellie's father is perfectly willing to lose his daughter, but stipulates that the first of her two suitors to raise $1,000 will be favored. Izzy rigs up a dummy and puts it in the way of a passing automobile at a turn in the road. After a motor party has run over the dummy, Izzy substitutes himself and then asks for damages. In this way he collects over a thousand dollars.

Chester is left $1,000 by a rich uncle and comes tearing along in his car to Nellie's house when he apparently runs over Izzy. He pays over his thousand, but later becomes suspicious and just as the knot is about to be tied comes running in with the police and the dummy. Izzy is exposed and arrested. Chester's money is returned and he and Nellie are united.

"ON THE BORDER" (August 7).—An American officer quartered in Mexico saves a young Mexican dancing girl from insult and rough treatment at the hands of Pablo and Marto, two rough-neck Mexicans. In revenge the two Mexicans plan to kill the American officer, and the dancer, in gratitude (now grown into love through constant association), plans to save him.

Going to the officer's room in the barracks, getting there only a shade ahead of the assassins, she finds the room empty, and hides behind a curtain, immediately after which the officer comes in and sits at his desk. At the same moment the hand of one of the Mexicans appears on the sill ready to fire at the officer, but before his finger can press the trigger the dancer plunges her knife into his hand, pinioning it to the window. His cries of pain and the report of the gun going off bring the officer and his men to the window and the attempt on his life is discovered and the assassins taken away to a cell. The fainting of the dancer behind the curtain brings the realization to the officer of her work in his behalf and they find happiness in each other's arms.

"THE WAGON OF DEATH" (Two Parts—August 15).—Bob Reynolds, a driver for a nitroglycerine wagon at the oil wells, is much mortified by the conduct of his younger brother Paul, who is dissipated. Through Bob's fiancee and his own innate decency, Paul reforms and takes a job at the oil wells with Bob and falls hopelessly in love with Bob's sweetheart, Nell. Bill Evans, a bad man and formerly one of Paul's cronies, resents his reform and later insults Nell, being well beaten up by Paul for his pains.

Later Evans holds up Nell's father as he and Nell are carrying the pay roll over the hills to the wells, but Paul rescues them. Bill afterwards returns to wreak vengeance on Paul, but seeing Paul's great love for his brother, decides he will revenge himself on Paul through his brother and plans a terrible death for Bob. His scheme is to frighten the team of Bob's wagon, so that they will run away and kill Bob, but before he can consummate his terrible purpose he gets drunk, asks a ride from Bob, is refused and they fight, Bob being thrown off into the road. The horses, frightened, run madly down the hill with the drunken Bill on the seat. Paul, up in the hills, sees the runaway with whom he thinks is his brother on the seat. At the foot of the long hill he sees Nell driving slowly up the hill blissfully unconscious of the terrible wagon of death dashing toward her. Choosing between death for his beloved brother and the girl he loves, Paul chooses death for the brother and shoots at the wagon, the concussion of the shot blowing it to bits. Believing he has killed his brother, he leaves a note for Nell telling her of the circumstances and prepares to flee the town, but en route meets his brother, safe and sound, and all is serene.

"FOR THE LAST EDITION" (Two Parts—August 22).—Bess Landers secures a job as special writer on a daily paper and meets there Robt. Barry, a young reporter, who is not very successful. They become acquainted and finally fall in love.

Barry is ordered to dig up a story on a local strike situation, the true details of which are being withheld by the big firm of grain men responsible. He is unable to get any news and fears for his job, and tells Bess about it. While the latter is at lunch, she overhears an office boy from the grain firm's office telling another boy that he and the entire office staff have been sent away for the afternoon because his boss is going to have a meeting regarding "sending for the soldiers on account of the strike," etc. Bess tells Bob of the tip and they go together to the office. A guard is on duty to prevent anyone entering and Bob starts a disturbance that draws him away long enough for Bess to slip in and hide in a closet. From her hiding place she learns of a plot to have two private detective (in the employ of the firm) blow up a fright car containing grain, claim that the strikers did it and thus have legal cause for calling out the troops on the grounds that the strikers precipitated the first violence.

Bess is locked in after she secures her evidence and the guard discovers her, but she eludes him by sliding down a fire hose which she unwinds and throws out a window, gets her tip to Bob, who hurries back to the office to start his "beat." Bess gets the police and they catch the two detectives red handed as they blow up the freight car. She hands her final evidence over to Bob and a great big story secures Bob a raise and the two marry.

"THE STOLEN ORE" (August 26).—Dad Holton and his little girl Leota live and mine near Stormy Creek. Dick Raleigh, a young thrifty fellow, loves Leota, but Dad objects to his attentions. Tom Andrews, a prospector, while inspecting some likely looking ore on Bear Mountain, while testing it with the hammer is struck in the face and falls to the canyon below. He is nursed back to health by Leota and Dad, who give him work in their little mine. During Leota's absence to town, a cave-in occurs at the mine, almost killing Dad. Andrews sees a chance to get some good-paying ore, together with their little savings.

Leota on her return from the store with supplies, is met by Moriette, a renegade Mexican, who drags her from the saddle. Her horse returns back along the road she came and is met by Dick Raleigh, who gallops back in time to save Leota. They return to the camp just as Andrews is leaving with his booty. A fight occurs and Dick takes him back to the sheriff, leaving Leota to nurse her injured father. Later on we see Dick and Leota living happy with Dad and the baby in their new home.

DOMINO.

THE THUNDERBOLT (Two Parts—August 6).—Katherine Davis lives with her mother and sister, Grace, in a village. Grace is engaged to the village parson, David Corson. Katherine determines to go to New York to make an art career for herself. Against the wishes of her mother and sister she leaves the village. Upon her arrival in New York she experiences hardships. While going to her art school one day she is seen by "Oily Welch," a man who trades in the virtue of women. He determines to possess the girl. He calls upon her in the art school, having previously seen her enter, compliments her upon her imaginary talent and finally persuades the girl to accept the money and allow herself to be set up in a luxurious studio. Katherine, however, repulses the advances of Welch, but he is willing to play a "waiting game." Meanwhile David Corson, the village parson, is invited to attend a meeting of his class in New York. He goes to the city and is there entertained by his friend, Smith. The class reunion follows and Corson prepares to leave again for the village. While walking to the station, he comes across Welch and Katherine, who are coming from a house in a Tenderloin street. He persuades the girl to return with him to the village in spite of the objections of Welch.

Welch, in a spirit of revenge and desire, follows the girl to the village and tries to compel her to return with him to New York, threatening her with exposure of her past in the village. Katherine is about to yield, fearing the condemnation of her village friends should they learn of her connection with Welch. David Corson meets Welch, however, follows him to his meeting place with Katherine and soundly thrashes him. Next Sunday Welch repairs to the village church with the intention of publishing the story of Katherine's life with him in New York. As he is about to enter, he is struck by a thunderbolt and killed.

KAYBEE.

THE GANGSTERS AND THE GIRL (Two Parts—August 7).—Molly Ashley, a child of the slums, is charged with being an accomplice to a shoplifter. Although innocent, she is convicted of shoplifting and sentenced to two years' imprisonment. Jim Tracy, the leader of a band of gangsters, rescues Molly. The following morning Detective Stone is assigned the task of locating and running down Jim Tracy's gang. In order to secure evidence against the gang, he disguises himself as one of the gangsters; runs into their place and pretends that the "cops" are after him. Tracy and the gang take him in. Molly falls in love with Stone and discovers his true identity. One of the crooks gets sore at Jim Tracy and betrays them to the police. Jim accuses Molly of betraying them. Stone resents his accusation. A fight follows and Jim is killed. Stone takes Molly away and gives her a chance to be self-supporting.

MAKE 'EM YOURSELF SLIDES

Make them yourself. Written with pen and ink or typewriter. Three minutes to make a slide. Used for advertising slides, to announce future or feature programmes, for chorus slides when chorus slide is missing. We send four colors of gelatin. The slides look well and anyone can make them. They are handy also for announcing vaudeville acts. In fact, they may be readily used for anything you may wish to say to your audience.

For the sum of $3.50 we will send, by parcel post, prepaid and insured, the following:
24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. Address:

FEATURE FILM STORIES

ECLECTIC.

THIS IS THE LIFE—Henry, pursuing his studies in the city and incidentally hugely enjoying himself, writes his Unce Hiram back in the country asking him if he can't send on some money of which he is badly in need. Uncle writes back that nephew's allowance isn't due for a month yet, that he himself is hard up as the crops are bad and the chickens aren't thriving. Henry comes back at him saying that as for chickens he has located a flock of more than ordinary excellence and invites his uncle to come down and look them over.

Uncle Hiram accepts and brings along Aunt Lucinda with him. Henry takes them to the beach and while the aunt is busy punishing a plate of ice cream gives his uncle the high sign and quietly sneaks him off to meet some charming young lady friends of his who are in bathing. The girls make a hit with Uncle and all are having a fine time when Lucinda breaks up the party in a jealous rage.

That night Hiram receives a note from Henry telling him to sneak away from Lucinda and he'll show him the time of his life. Uncle makes his getaway by the fire escape while Lucinda is sleeping, and straightway nephew and he begin to hit only the high spots. But Lucinda, ever suspicious, has been sleeping with one eye open and not long after her husband's escape discovers his absence. She dresses in a hurry and gets hot on the trail. Hiram in the midst of his festivities sees her coming and beats it back to the hotel. He climbs the fire escape, gets into the wrong room, and then—complications.

THE CORSAIR (Four Parts).—On a raid by the corsairs several slaves are captured, among them a very beautiful Greek girl, Medora. The Lieutenant who has been in charge of the expedition casts covetous eyes on Medora and desires her for his personal harem. She is afraid of the man and on arriving at the headquarters of the band appeals to the head of the corsairs for protection. He takes her for himself, and tells the Lieutenant to pick one of the other girls. The Lieutenant becomes very angry and attacks his chief. The chief gets the better of him and throws him out of the band. The Lieutenant, thirsting for revenge, goes to the Sultan and tells him of the plans of the band. The Sultan has been looking for an opportunity to break up the band for some time and gives the Lieutenant some soldiers to go to the home of the Corsairs and secure the beautiful slave. The expedition is successful and in the absence of the chief they carry off the slaves. The Lieutenant, however, does not say anything of the booty which is hidden in the cave as he intends to return alone some other time to secure it. When the chief Corsair returns he is told of the attack by his father who has seen the whole proceeding. The Corsair is aroused and plans a ruse to get Medora back. Medora has been taken to the Sultan who places her in his harem and makes her one of his favorites. The Corsairs dress up as women and go to the palace. The Chief poses as a slave dealer and gains admittance to the palace to show the Sultan his beautiful captives. When in the interior of the palace they cast aside their disguises and attack the harem guards. They are repulsed, however, and the chief is made a prisoner. On Medora's suggestion he is put in a cell to await torture. That evening the Lieutenant goes to the cave to secure the booty. He is successful in gaining admittance to the store place and proceeds to take the choice of the valuables.

The same evening Medora plans to escape with the Corsair. She gains admittance to the prison and is successful in getting the Corsair out. They proceed to a boat and row away to the former hiding place of the band. When they arrive they discover the Lieutenant in the act of cleaning out the booty. Following him back to the cave the Corsair closes the secret door, locking the Lieutenant in so that he cannot escape. The Corsair and Medora then sail away, leaving the Lieutenant to his fate.

WHISKERS.—Billy Blink and Willie Wink are pals and live together but the girls they love, Mazie and Madge, are unacquainted. In their hasty preparations for their respective outings for the day, Billy and Willie exchange coats. While Billy is automobiling with Mazie his car stops and he prepares to locate the trouble. Taking off his coat, he gets to work. A photograph in his pocket attracts Mazie's eye, but, alas, it is not her picture.

Explanations are futile, and, in rebuff, Mazie and Billy part. The disconsolate lover goes home. Life is no longer worth living and he decides to end it all.

Practically the same difficulty confronts Willie for Madge has found a photo of the strange Mazie in her sweetheart's pocket.

Billy decides to hang himself to a water pipe in his kitchen and leaves a note to Willie bidding him "Good-bye." But the kitchen pipe was not meant for a scaffold and Billy's weight brings it down. The pipe snaps and a deluge ensues. Whiskers, a notorious burglar, is "visiting" the apartment at the time and is attracted by the noise. He finds Billy and at pistol point orders "Hands up.' Billy begs Whiskers to shoot. Whiskers demands money for the murder. Billy consents. Whiskers' feet get cold but he agrees to have a friend do the deed. Billy pays him $100, and Whiskers exits. By this time Mazie and Madge have met and an understanding is reached. The girls hurry to the boys' bachelor apartment and beg for forgiveness. Now Billy's chief worry is to avoid the death penalty he has paid for. And his fears lead him into the funniest mix-ups imaginable.

THE I. S. P. CO.

"THE CELLAR OF DEATH" (Four Parts).—A strong friendship springs up between Dick Thornton and Harry Gideon, two young artists sharing the same studio. Harry takes Dick to his home, where he meets and falls in love with Harry's sister, Sybil. They become engaged. While Harry seeks a gay time Dick works untiringly and becomes a successful artist.

Harry receives a call from Foster, a companion, who secretly runs a night club, an adjoining opium den, and is head of a gang of thieves. He invites Dick and Harry to join him at cards at the club. Dick declines, but Harry, hoping to recover some of his losses, consents. At the card table he soon loses everything and being physically and mentally fatigued, readily yields to Foster's persuasions to visit the den. There he smokes the deadly drug. As time goes on Harry's visits to the den increase, while those to his home are less frequent.

Lady Gideon is anxious to have a painting of Sybil wearing the famous Gideon diamonds, and as Harry seems indifferent, Dick undertakes the task, first having to complete a painting for the Academy, for which he has great difficulty in finding a model. Finally he goes to the club with Harry in search of one. Here he is successful in finding Nanetta, who readily agrees to pose. The picture nears completion and Dick considers himself in a position to commence the painting of Sybil, and an appointment is made. Unknown to Dick his model has fallen in love with him, and when he greets Sybil affectionately Nanetta is insanely jealous and swears revenge. At the conclusion of Sybil's first sitting Nanetta sees Dick locking the Gideon diamonds in a small safe. She informs Foster, who knowing Harry has a key, waits until he is asleep in the opium den. Then he steals the key and robs the safe.

Next morning Dick learns of the failure of the bank where his money is deposited, and on going to the safe to count his spare cash is horrified to find the diamonds missing. Dick becomes suspicious of Harry's peculiar actions and follows him, to his astonishment, to the opium den. As soon as the Chinaman has filled the pipes and goes into an adjoining room Dick snatches Harry's pipe and breaks it, telling him of the loss of the family diamonds. This seems to arouse Harry, and he rushes from the room. Dick, attracted by strange voices, stays to listen. Detected by the Chinaman, who summons assistance, he is overpowered and taken into an adjoining room, where he is confronted by Foster and a gang of thieves, among them Nanetta. On the table he sees the Gideon diamonds. His vehement accusations enrage Foster, who orders his men to take him to the underground cellar, where he is bound to a ring in the wall. To his mortification he realizes that as the river outside rises the water enters through a grating. After many hours of suspense and struggle the water begins to trickle through, and gradually increases until Dick is rescued by Nanetta.

THE PHANTOSCOPE

If you would use motion pictures as an aid in salesmanship, you need THE PHANTOSCOPE. If you would use motion pictures as an aid in efficiency instruction, you need THE PHANTOSCOPE. If you would use motion pictures as an aid in education you need THE PHANTOSCOPE. If you would have a machine you carry as conveniently as a suit case, can set up in any room in just seventy seconds, and without tools other than your two hands, you need THE PHANTOSCOPE. If there's any doubt in your mind about its value to you in YOUR work, just note the great number of users of THE PHANTOSCOPE. Just as with the automobile, and as one would naturally expect, there have been striking improvements made since the first PHANTOSCOPE. And yet there are many machines which have been in almost continuous service, since the very first, and they are running smoother and sweeter than ever.

The price is $100 complete—Motor driven $125.

VENTILATION COOLING HEATING

Heating and cooling problem revolutionized by Typhoon System.

You keep cool in front of a desk fan and not in back; apply this common sense and blow the air into your theatre.

A 48" Typhoon Multiblade Blower has sixteen blades, an ordinary exhaust fan has six; it is the blades that do the business.

A Typhoon Tubular Air Warmer will heat and ventilate at the same time.

The low price of effective apparatus will surprise you. Catalogue "W" gives information.

TYPHOON FAN CO. NEW YORK CITY 1544 BROADWAY

You can increase your business

In your line, just as in any other line, modern up-to-date methods increase the profits.

It's the reputation for good pictures that counts at the box office.

Your film service may be good, but the pictures cannot be shown as they should be, unless you have the right kind of light.

The Mercury GE Arc Rectifier changes, a.c. to d.c. and therefore will give you the most brilliant, snappy, "talked about" pictures it is possible to get—far and away ahead of anything you could ever get with any a.c. arc.

With the Rectifier the light is steady, intensified, more of it is directed right on the lens, pictures are whiter and brighter and flicker is practically done away with.

Further, your cost for current is considerably decreased—many rectifier users say the saving is as high as 50%.

And did you ever consider the advertising value of a Rectifier in front of your house.

Yes—you can increase your business by good "service" to the public.

Booklet B3274 explains the operation of the Rectifier and gives other information worth knowing. Our projecting engineers will gladly co-operate with you any time.

The Light Which Does Not Interfere With Projection

The day of the dark theatre has passed. This is due primarily to the perfection of the EYE COMFORT LIGHTING System. This system is neither an imitation nor a substitute. It is based on fundamental principles discovered by us and proven by long practice to be absolutely correct. It is the original indirect lighting.

Indirect Light does not interfere with the clearness of the picture. It has no glare, does not distract attention or cause headaches.

It lights the house evenly. It relieves eyestrain.

The Eye Comfort Lighting System

is so good and so successful that it is imitated. But these imitations, which are offered you because they are "cheap," lack the powerful one-piece silvered mirror X-RAY EYE COMFORT reflectors which control and direct the light by their scientific design and evenly light the house. These are the most powerful reflectors made and require less current than any others.

Fill in the blank below and allow our engineers to lay out a plan for lighting your theatre. This won't cost you a cent and does not obligate you in any way. But it will tell you exactly how much EYE COMFORT LIGHTING for your theatre would cost.

Kimble Fans Draw the Movie "Fans"

There's no use talking, you can't fool the public. They're not going to a hot, stuffy moving picture house just because it has good pictures and is nearby. They're going where they can see good pictures and still be comfortable, even though it is several blocks farther down the street.

Ventilate your theater with Kimble Fans and you will have full houses on the hottest nights. It's a joy to go where the air is always fresh and wholesome.

Kimble Fans may be used as either intake or exhaust. Simply pull the chain. They may be run fast or slow or any speed between. They reduce operating cost in direct proportion to every reduction in speed. No other fans have these features. No other fans can give as good ventilation at as low a cost. Write for the Red Fan Catalog and learn the facts.

"How clear the pictures are!"

You've often overheard that remark—and it's as strong a commendation, brings as much business as does a favorable comment on the picture story itself.

The "clearest pictures" are on Eastman film because the product is right, chemically and physically.

It is easily identifiable by the stencil "Eastman" in the margin.

COMPENSARC

This Machine cuts 2/3 from your Light Bills

Mr. Manager

If you are on a 110 or 220 volt circuit and you are using a rheostat to reduce the voltage to 35 at the arc in your lamp, you are paying for 2/3 more "juice" than you are actually using. Can you afford to waste all this energy supplied from the line, over and above what you really need?

The Fort Wayne Compensarc saves all this waste by reducing the voltage without losing any: makes a clearer, whiter, steadier light, and eliminates all danger of fires caused by overheated rheostats.

We have a little 22 page booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat" that we want to send you. It will tell you plainly how you can make a big saving and a better light. Send us your name and address.

A Friendly Tip from Carl Laemmle

"The new Universal serial story, 'THE TREY O' HEARTS,' by Louis Joseph Vance, will be the hit of the new season. You can take my word for it that it is by far the hottest, liveliest, most exciting, most interesting story ever shown in moving pictures before a discriminating public. You know that I have never given you a wrong tip, and I am not going to start now. To be sure, 'LUCILLE LOVE' was a big money maker, but 'THE TREY O' HEARTS' will beat it to a frazzle. By making arrangements now, you are absolutely assured of a record-breaking business the day you show the picture, for a period of fifteen weeks. It will cost you a little extra money, but it is well worth it. 'A word to the wise, etc.'"

BIG NEWS

News is something that happens! Most folks hear about it but few SEE it! If they could see it happen they would jump at the chance—hearing about it only stimulates their desire to see just what did take place.

THE PATHÉ DAILY NEWS

shows what happened as it happened when it happened. It's big news in which all the world and his wife are interested, and it's the day's news issued daily. That's why all the neighborhood will come to your theatre to SEE what they've heard about. It makes new patrons out of former passersby.

THE SIREN

Six reels which spell tragedy for an alluring woman and the men she allures—fishermen to noblemen, her own husband, too, are burnt in the flame she keeps burning on the altar of her vanity. She fully senses her unusual power over men and doesn't hesitate to use it, leaving a trail of bitterness and desolated families behind her until a hand, not a man's hand, reaches out from the wreck and snaps the cord of her ill-fated career.

NICK WINTER

AND THE LOST PRINCE.

A 3 reel comedy drama continuing the adventures of the great detective.

There is no other character shown on the screen who can do so many different things in so many different ways. If you have seen him you know that it is so. If you haven't seen him you must do so in order to appreciate the remarkable resourcefulness of the man in scheming so many ways of circumventing the criminals and the equally brilliant attempts of the law-breakers to trap the great detective.

Eclectic's 4-a-week

MONDAY—The Perils of Pauline, every two weeks. Short Subjects alternate weeks.

TUESDAY—American one or two reel comedy.

WEDNESDAY—Super-excellent multiple reel production.

FRIDAY—Surpassing attraction of several reels.

THE PERILS OF PAULINE

Pauline's only fault is that she's too courageous. She has more nerve than any girl you've ever seen, in the films or out.

But it doesn't take any nerve on your part to give Pauline a run. She's as reliable as the best pitcher in the league and draws as big a crowd. Even in the tightest of places she's ready to step out on your screen with the same assurance of getting across, and restores all the old confidence in yourself, and your patrons' confidence in you. A serial film —each episode complete in itself.

YOU TAKE NO GAMBLE ON PAULINE—SHE'S A SURE BET

THE MASHER'S MISHAP

A One Reel Hartigan Comedy

Somebody else's mishap is always funny. The Masher's Mishap comes up to the mark, and the Eclectic marks for humor is getting ever harder to reach—the kind of laughter that leaves wrinkles.

WAR!

We are prepared to furnish the following Multiple-reel Eclectic Features dealing with modern European warfare:

THE LAST VOLUNTEER—6 Parts—Scenes of carnage at seat of Austrian-Servian War.
FAITHFUL UNTO DEATH—4 Parts—A tale of Franco-German warfare.
WAR IS HELL—4 Parts—Showing the havoc wrought by air-craft—awful realism.
NAPOLEON—5 Parts—Historical drama of the world's most famous warrior.
ALL LOVE EXCELLING—3 Parts—Stirring scenes in the Crimean War.

THREE SPLENDID MONEY-GETTING SUBJECTS YOU CAN HAVE RIGHT NOW!

They're making money every minute—these three!!! Call up any General Film Office (Special Feature Department) and make a date!

We vouch for them absolutely! From the standpoint of story, photography and general dull-season possibilities, we believe them to have no equals in inexpensive summer attractions.

Let us suggest you try them.

ANNE BOLEYN

A story of the Second Wife of Henry VIII. Every School Child Knows the History of Her Ill-Fated, Doom-Laden Marriage. Anne deposed Queen Catherine, only to give way in time to the new Court Beauty, Jane Seymour. The Courtship, Marriage and Death of Anne Boleyn is one of the Cruelest, Weirdest incidents in the annals of English History. As a Picture, It's a WINNER! THREE PARTS

A KINGDOM AT STAKE

The Pretty Child Queen is Marked by Anarchists for Murder. But, Luckily, her Native Sweetness wins the Heart of the Chief Conspirator, Her daily Companion and Instructor. How the Plot failed.....How the well-meaning but misguided revolutionists were condemned to Die, only to be pardoned at the Eleventh Hour by their childish, loving little Monarch, makes, we firmly believe, the most pleasing, dainty, thoroughly-charming hot weather offering we have seen this summer. Already many theatres have cashed in on "A Kingdom at Stake." Have You? THREE PARTS

OTHELLO

Truly a wonderful subject, made from the Divine Shakespearean Tragedy of that Name. Staged at Venice, Italy, in the environment of the Original, Following Closely the Thread of Shakespeare's Beautiful Story. But—And Here's a Vital Point—You Need be no Shakespeare Student to enjoy the wonders of his written story. All its dramatic power and intensity have been retained three-fold in the film version. Again we say, A Truly Wonderful Subject. You will find in it great box-office possibilities. If you haven't booked it, Do It Now! FIVE PARTS

MYSTERY OF THE OCTAGONAL ROOM

Tenth mystery in the "Chronicles of Cleek"

By Thomas W. Hanshew.

Squire Shadbolt's wife had disappeared. When Cleek arrived at the house and investigated he found the body of Maurice Ward back of the panels in the Octagonal Room. The only apparent cause of his death were some pricks in the skin of his hand. Could you solve these mysteries? Cleek will.

Facts and Comments

THE most outrageous governmental interference with motion pictures, far surpassing even the drastic regulations of Russia, is suffered by the exhibitors in British Columbia. A friend and reader of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD in Vancouver has sent us a copy of these "Regulations." The licenses are excessive. As our correspondent says, "Some of the picture shows here have to pay a fee which amounts to about $225 per year." An exhibitor is liable to a fine and possibly loss of license if he displays a film showing the approval of other censors than censors of British Columbia. The government makes it a crime to display other than censored films, but declines to be responsible for what happens to the films while they are waiting for inspection. If they are burnt up or torn or injured in any way whatever the exhibitor or the exchange, as the case may be, has to bear the loss. A special approval of the censors is required for the use of "phonographic or talking machine records or similar contrivances for the reproduction of sound." The words or sounds are as much subject to censorship as the pictures. Even churches conducting a motion picture entertainment are taxed ten dollars, the same fee being exacted of shows given by educational institutions "or in aid of charitable work." The operator and the "apprentice operator" do not escape; they have to pay an annual license too.

Particularly foolish and severe seem to be the regulations governing the licensing of film exchanges. The general license for film exchanges is three hundred dollars. An exchange paying this fee may have as many reels as it wants to put on its shelves. An exchange handling only ten feature subjects is taxed only fifty dollars. This of course enables an outsider to come into the territory with ten features at a time and "clean up" in competition with the man who is a resident of the province and pays six times this tax. The exhibitors in this Canadian province have no organization, and this hostile legislation, almost confiscatory in its character, was enacted without the slightest opposition of the exhibitors. We cannot think of a greater object lesson to exhibitors who have so far done nothing toward organizing and co-operating.

THE war now in progress in Europe will undoubtedly affect the film situation here. Even now, before there has been any serious clash, communication between the two continents has been greatly disturbed and a blockade of European ports in the course of the conflict will exclude the bulk of European importations for some time to come. As the export of films goes principally to England, and as England is in a position to guard and convoy her commerce, the loss in exports may not be very serious. Inasmuch as we have in the past suffered from an overimportation of cheap features so-called the situation is not without its compensating advantages.

IN many of our first-class theatres features consisting of more than one reel are now put on without any intermission whatever. The consoling assurances at the end of each thousand feet that "the next part will follow immediately" are cut out and instead of a promise there is the immediate performance. It is of course ever so much better to present a great feature as a whole rather than in pieces. This applies we think to all features under six thousand feet. Where the feature exceeds this length a pause like the interval between two long acts is appropriate, but we ought to get away from the ancient phraseology such as: "One Minute While We Change the Reel." The old clumsy and undignified way of presenting a multiple reel still obtains, we are sorry to say, in even some of our best theatres in this city and always takes away from the real merit of the performance. Let us get away from measuring films of quality as if the strips of celluloid which record so much art and effort were simply merchandise like cloth or ribbons.

MANY exhibitors in the states afflicted with censorship complain to us of the habit of legal censors who distribute passes to their friends, wholesale and retail. To put it mildly, we consider such acts on the part of the censors a high-handed proceeding. There is not, as we read the laws, the slightest legal warrant for any such action. In Pennsylvania scores and more than scores of "inspectors" are appointed who are wholly unknown to the law. These men and women are presented with free admissions at the expense of the exhibitor. We are glad to learn that some of the exhibitors in Philadelphia have declined to recognize these passes. If these exhibitors stand firm, as we believe they will, the matter is bound to get into the courts, and we have no doubt whatever that the final outcome will be in favor of the exhibitors. We ought to resist petty abuses of this nature to the utmost.

The Organized Exhibitors

By W. Stephen Bush.

THE idea seems to prevail in some offices that censorship is merely a topic of discussion, an argument as it were in a moot-court, a sort of target for theoretic spitballs. There is a tendency, too, in certain quarters, to regard much discussion of censorship as inopporune, and this extreme willingness to avoid further warfare upon censorship is especially strong on the part of the beaten sponsors of censorship. It is quite plain that the movement for imposing taxes and restrictions on motion pictures has received a check; it threatened to pass Congress when at the critical moment The Moving Picture World halted its progress. Another powerful blow at censorship was delivered at Dayton when the convention declared against censorship of every kind. Now that the spectre of censorship looms less horribly than it did some months ago the movement for genuine co-operative organization among the exhibitors has grown with encouraging swiftness. From letters at this office and from interviews with the new president of the League and state presidents it is pretty clear that the League has a future of the greatest usefulness before it.

In the two states where official censorship exists an active campaign for a repeal of the obnoxious, un-American laws is under way. The anti-censorship sentiment is the strongest possible cement for binding the exhibitors together and uniting them in one common organization. The need of the hour is the strong state organization. These organizations will become more representative, including the exhibitors in every state who have achieved success in their profession, who stand high in the esteem of their communities and who enjoy the confidence of their brother exhibitors. We cannot help commending the idea of the president of the organized exhibitors of Pennsylvania, who intends to organize the state by counties. With slight modifications, due to less densely populated territories, the same plan might well be followed in every state.

One of the obstacles in the successful agitation for union has been the neglect or indifference of exhibitors in paying their per capita tax. The cause in large part of this neglect or refusal has been a widespread distrust and apathy caused by the advocates of censorship who controlled the working machinery of the national organization. Now that this cause for distrust has been removed there is every reason to believe that the per capita tax will be paid with more readiness. Owing to the prominence of politics within the organization the exhibitor hesitated to lend an active and enthusiastic support. He found it difficult to understand why he should contribute. The benefits he had a right to expect from his membership in the national organization were invisible to the naked eye. The plans of President Pearce are for the elimination of politics of any sort and for constructive, useful work. With the united support of strong and representative state organizations he hopes to be able to start a Bureau of Assistance, such as has often been advocated in these columns. It is proposed to accumulate valuable information at headquarters; a library for the exhibitor as it were. A digest of the laws touching motion pictures in every state is to be prepared and plenty of data are to be gathered which may be sent to the exhibitor who is fighting legal oppression of any kind, whether it spells censorship or fanatical restriction on the modern Sunday or hostile and confiscatory legislation of any kind. In time a legal bureau may be created which specializes in all the problems affecting motion picture interests equipped with able counsel ready to go to any threatened point and do special service in co-operation with local counsel. After all, the exhibitor has a right to know why he should pay a per capita tax to the national organization. Once you convince him that the money is used for the benefit of the whole organization and that he derives at least an indirect advantage from it he will be quite willing to contribute.

Before we can have a powerful and valuable national organization we must have large and representative state organizations. Whatever direct and tangible benefits come to the exhibitor just at this moment come necessarily through the activity of state organization. Looking over the state organizations as they now exist one cannot help noticing that their membership is small in proportion to the numbers of existing exhibitors in any given state. There are, roughly speaking, about fifteen thousand regular exhibitors in the United States. Allowing for small theatres, which change their owners more frequently, and making other deductions, an estimate of twelve thousand is rather conservative. How many of these twelve thousand do now belong to the League? How many representatives have been active in the ranks within the last twelve months? The answers to these questions can be easily given by any one even slightly familiar with the facts. The Moving Picture World was the first newspaper to urge the advantages of organization upon exhibitors. Columns upon columns of this paper have been devoted to advocating the promotion of organization. If until now these advantages have scarcely been felt by the exhibitors the cause must be sought in poor leadership. With a new regime the improvement ought to be great and immediate. The aim of the new president is to increase membership. He has never been identified with any faction and has always been an uncompromising foe of censorship. He has in an extraordinary degree the confidence of the community in which he has resided practically all of his life. His firm was one of the earliest pioneers in motion pictures in the South, and the old firm name Pearce & Schreck was always popular with exhibitors. Mr. Pearce is conducting and has conducted motion picture houses of splendid repute. He is a practical man and in thorough sympathy with the needs and problems of his fellow exhibitors. He realizes that by far the larger part of the state organizations stand in need of strengthening and he is anxious to do his share toward this all-important work.

This is the day of the exhibitors' great opportunity, and the time to start the new constructive work is the present moment. The new president believes in friendly relations between the exhibitors and the other branches of the industry. The idea that the interest of the exhibitor is inconsistent with a friendly attitude toward exchange and producer is a most pernicious notion and should never have been encouraged. There has been a growing mutual sympathy between exhibitor and distributor and producer, greater and more real to-day than ever before in the history of motion pictures. Kinematography is like a big tree one cannot injure any part of the tree without hurting the tree itself.

Screen Stories

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

WHAT is more attractive, what more misunderstood than the story? From earliest times it has been handed down to us, passing from generation to generation, through unnumbered centuries, as universally loved today as it was before poets perfected its form. We can go back beyond the dark ages and find the essence of poetic legend in those archives perpetual, mental storehouses of people, as replete with thought and feeling as in modern times. The one artistic expression of life that has known few modifications of sentiment, whatever its changes of form, is the story. It may have gradually acquired strength and intellection —it may gain artistic truth and beauty on the screen —but it still tints the gray activities of life with the bright and varied hues of imagination, just as it always has done.

Let us acknowledge the moral importance of every material law, especially where it is considered in relation to the ends of human existence. Let us bow to all the precepts that guided us through the intricacies of conduct. Let us not detract in the least from those basal principles which have served to indicate how we must live if we would be of some use to ourselves and to society. Moral culture is, however, not the result of any single influence, and the influence most likely to be of power with us is that to which we incline, the one which comes nearest to possessing a universal charm. Is it not the story? Does it not appeal to what comes nearest to being innate morality, a sense of justice and injustice that is very keen among children? Is not an interesting experience of what is best in human life quite as effective ethically as preachment?

What is there more difficult to teach, for instance, than love of kin. That sentiment must spring straight from the spirit within us. There is little need of telling a loyal heart what it should feel, but how that feeling should be manifested is quite another matter. For instance, a screen story showing the delightful courtesy displayed in entertaining friends and acquaintances and the indifference to courtesy among members of a family, where coarseness irritates and irritability is given free vent, would have the power of example. What greater force is there in education than example? In the struggle for supremacy that constitutes life there is a contagion caught by those down in the struggle from those who are succeeding. The right sort of a screen story has a similar effect, for the right sort depicts a great character whose ideals are communicated to the audience.

Plays without a single great character in them, such as I am often called upon to review and expected to praise because of adequate treatment, are really useless. They do not enlist common sympathy, and they may lead to a fatal separation between thought and feeling. The element of feeling, so essential to success in a drama, is really a means to an end, and that end is a vigorous assertion of character representing one or another fine attribute, hence the heart should be quickened in a drama of the mind's illumination. I lay stress on characterization because, in any expression of life, the chief study of mankind is man. We should show what man has done and what he can do, particularly in acute moments, when his full energies and nobility are called forth, in order to lay hold of that first essential to dramatic success, interest.

The whole drift of screen stories that win is ethical. The villain inevitably co-operates in his doom. The manly hero overcomes cowardice in himself and brutal egotism in others to the end that womanhood and childhood should be protected and justice done to humankind. Such is the general tendency of popular plays, though it may be covered by sensational incident or comedy entertainment to keep moralizing out of sight. Mere portrayal of evil, such as that in vice pictures, does not win because it repels popular sentiment, even when it supplies material for thought. The hideousness of vice is valuable in proportion to its application in sustaining what is best in the whole of our lives. The story that is purposeless causes the true purpose of great stories to be misunderstood.

The story has come to be lightly regarded as what is merely entertaining, irrespective of truth in its details. That is because it is told in action and without moral precepts. It really offers the charm of variety by its presentation of what is good and bad in human nature and comes nearer the truth than the most monotonously good sermon ever preached. The basal elements of human nature are not in accord with any code of morals; they are usually in revolt against codes of all kinds, and are attracted by what beautifies, charms and delights. We love the story because it drives home its point by enlivening example. Through the poet, through the novelist, we have been able to see all the variegated colors of human character as sunlight is split up by the spectrum. We recoil from the sermon, whether of the pulpit or the parent, and go to the font that satisfies our thirst as to the heart of Mother Nature for emotional stimulus and mental vigor, to our well-loved story.

The lack in most screen stories is that of sincerity. They are written for what they will bring rather than for what they can give. It has been a matter of surprise to producers that I refuse to prepare this or that drama for visualization, particularly when it has done fairly well on the stage. A great deal that is false and misleading has been profitable in theatres, but I refuse to perpetuate what is of no further value and particularly what is an error in the light of modern knowledge. Any dramatist may be wrong in his premises or misled by them, but he will more surely carry conviction if he writes what he believes to be true or in accord with the best authorities to be found. Nothing convinces that is not founded on conviction, and I have no patience with retelling a story on the screen in anything like the manner of its stage presentation. Such methods are as inane as would be an attempt to reproduce the structure of a novel on the stage.

This New Art is far enough advanced to stand on its own foundation for popularity and to develop along lines best suited to its requirements. It is time for talented dramatists and gifted novelists to forget form and treatment in the older arts and prepare a story for visualization so that the director can produce it as written. Whatever changes are to be made for its improvement can be worked out before scene rehearsals begin, so that the idiocy of making up the story while "going along" will be forever eliminated from high-class productions. The plans of the architect should be perfected before contractors get on the job, so that the completed structure will be admirable in all of its proportions, a splendid interpretation of human life.

Censors Defied

"John Barleycorn," Unblessed of Censors Showing in Garrick Theater at Philadelphia—Managers Wait in Vain for Patrol Wagon—J. Louis Breitinger Threatens—That's ALL.

By W. Stephen Bush.

PHILADELPHIA has now furnished ample proof of the fact that a weak law unsupported by public sentiment cannot be enforced. Up to the time of going to press the uncensored pictures known as "John Barleycorn" were being shown at the classic Garrick Theater, Chestnut and Broad streets, without any let or hindrance by the authorities, charged with the enforcement of the censorship law. The exhibition went on not only without the official approbation of J. Louis Breitinger, who is head censor hereabouts, but in clean, open and blithesome defiance of that more or less redoubtable official.

The exhibition opened very close to schedule time, 11 A. M. Monday, August 3. W. E. Smith, who represents the Paramount Picture Corporation in Philadelphia, C. H. Pierce, the special envoy of Bosworth personally and Bosworth, Inc., and also of Frank A. Garbutt displayed themselves publicly and invitingly, courting apprehension and longing for the patrol-wagon, but both of them were sincerely disappointed.

Smith, as well as Pierce, had a crown of martyrdom cunningly concealed about his person, but the precious emblem went dusty before the day was out. The censor failing to act, disappointed their fondest hopes.

Ripples of Excitement.

The day was not entirely uneventful. The humid and heavy atmosphere which prevails in Philadelphia in midsummer, even on the river and on the roof gardens, was somewhat enlivened by an incident which occurred around noon. A dapper young man called upon Smith, telling him that he came from Police headquarters and was the Secretary of the Superintendent of Police. The hopes of Mr. Smith rose high. He looked around for the telephone book to notify his bondsman. Mr. Pierce then appeared in the offing, and learning of the identity of the caller looked as criminal as possible. Alas! the young man wanted nothing more than two seats for the night performance. He went away smilingly while Smith and Pierce were quite disconsolate and wandered into the adjoining drug store to drink a few grape-juice cocktails in honor of "John Barleycorn."

Again, in the evening, something happened which for the moment threw us all into an ecstacy of anticipation. A man who, by his appearance, might have been a rustic Sherlock Holmes, presented one of the celebrated blue cards which Mr. Breitinger distributes with such sweeping generosity in and about Philadelphia. The blue card bore a legend setting forth that the bearer thereof was an inspector under the authority of the Board of Censors and must be admitted into the show forthwith. Pierce and Smith had a minute before the appearance of this man registered a solemn vow that they would utterly ignore any of the "Breitinger Blue Cards." Mr. Pierce, in his blandest manner, started to inform the man that his card would be good only if reinforced by the regular price of admission. It was then that the mysterious stranger revealed his relationship to J. Louis Breitinger.

"I am," he said, "a cousin of Mr. Breitinger and Breitinger is my name." Pierce and Smith exchanged significant glances, as if they would say "The Hour Has Come." Nothing happened, however. The cousin passed into the theater and although I joined in the wait for his return he simply escaped us.

Comments on J. Louis Breitinger.

Even then, however, we were slow to give up hope. It was near midnight when Pierce and Smith at last retired unpunished, and alas, even unarrested. They had a camera man ready to make a record of the first censorship arrest, but his services were not required. It is possible, though by no means probable that arrests will follow in the near future. While waiting for something to turn up the methods and policies of J. Louis Breitinger were the theme of interested discussion in the fine, spacious lobby of this noble theater.

Said one well-known exchange man: "I wish I knew Breitinger's office hours, but they seem to be kept more or less secret. He examines, or fails to examine reels just as exactly as he pleases. It often happens that I am under contract to deliver a certain feature on a certain day, but my explanation of this circumstance never seems to move Breitinger. I am doing all I can to comply with the law; my certified check for the examination fee and my application blank go to Harrisburg at the earliest possible moment, but this does not seem to facilitate matters in Breitinger's office. Up to a few days ago we did not even get a receipt for the reels which we delivered to him, and we get no written record of his approval when he is graciously pleased to bestow his approval. I guess, sometimes, he forgets that he has examined and approved a film. In one case an assistant in my office brought back word to me that Breitinger had approved a certain film. I then sent the film on a circuit only to get a letter from Breitinger warning me that I was releasing a film which he had neither seen nor approved. I wonder what kind of bookkeeping he does and whether he keeps a record of his work. Why, only a day or two ago, he returned a reel with his verbal approval and I at once put it on the screen. After the picture had been running for a few days he sent word that he must see it again. As far as I know the law requires Breitinger to examine films but he seems to delegate considerable part of this work to others, among them a callow youth whom I met in his office the other day. The idea of this young man passing upon the entertainment of his elders struck me as particularly amusing, and I made bold to ask him whether he expected to tell his parents what shows they might safely attend. The young man thereupon burst into a prolonged fit of indignation and I discreetly withdrew."

Character of the Audience.

One of the unique features of this uncensored exhibition in Philadelphia was the character of the audience which had come to attend the performance. The audience consisted of the finest types of the city noted for its genuine Americanism. Men and women in about equal proportions watched the picture with the close attention which is frequently more eloquent of approval than a burst of applause. The manner and the language of the audience, as I saw them file into the theater, bespoke good breeding and refinement. The behavior of the audience in the theater itself reminded one of the best traditions in the classic show houses of the country. Ninety per cent. of the spectators reported approval of the film as a moral lesson on especially prepared ballots which were handed to them in the lobby, as they passed out. The vote was overwhelmingly in favor of the picture as a moral lesson. Very close to 2,000 persons saw the picture on Monday and the box-office receipts were highly satisfactory.

The prices were 25 and 50 cents for the night performance and 25 cents for the matinee, which means breaking records in a city like Philadelphia where the nickel is still the prevailing price of admission. Among the patrons were numerous well known doctors, clergymen of all denominations and many social workers. These latter had been invited to attend the show at the expense of the management.

Why No Arrest Was Made.

Breitinger must have realized the danger of making an arrest under the existing circumstances. If the law were defied he knew it was being defied with the active encouragement of the best people in Philadelphia. It was quite plain to him that the embodiment of a vicious principle can be stronger than the principle itself and instinctively perhaps he retired, figuratively speaking, behind the lofty barriers of his official dignity, keeping an impressive, and more or less dignified silence. A few days before the exhibition, and on the first day of the performance, Breitinger was pursued by reporters who demanded to know what he was going to do if "John Barleycorn" was shown without his official "O. K." He is said to have replied to some that the eliminations demanded by him had been carried out. If he was correctly reported, he is evidently mistaken, because the managers of the exhibition laid special stress on the fact that no attention whatever had been paid to his orders. Another reported him as saying "that he would not interfere with the performance until the Court of Common Pleas had passed upon the constitutionality of the law." I tried to reach Breitinger myself but he had left in the early part of the afternoon, it was said, for Atlantic City.

Probable Effect of Breitinger's Failure to Act.

Exhibitors all over the State of Pennsylvania, and indeed, all over the United States, cannot help drawing the conclusion that Censorship of every kind and description is weak and foolish and cannot resist the attack of Common Sense coupled with courage. The city of Philadelphia and, indeed, the State of Pennsylvania, has been filled with strange rumors about an understanding, or a sort of alliance between Breitinger and certain groups of the organized producers, or rather their representatives in this territory. It has been stated that one of these groups is paying for the rent of the Philadelphia projection room, where Breitinger insists all films examined in Philadelphia must be taken. Rumor has it that even the ice water and the services of an electrician are paid for in this way. Nobody knows how many films Breitinger himself examines, but it is well known that some features come out of his office and are approved in the twinkling of an eye, while others have to wait for some time. It is said, that at least on one occasion, the examination of certain films then on the screen were interrupted to make way for another brand of film. This may be perfectly proper and entirely within the discretion of the censor, but it naturally gives rise to comment. With this uncensored exhibition going on in the Garrick Theater the prestige and influence of Breitinger as a conscientious and fearless official may suffer. The friendly understandings and alliances may come to an end.

Press Strong Against Censorship.

The press of Philadelphia is unanimous in its opposition to censorship. The North American, a notable advocate of local option, claims that Breitinger and a relative and namesake in the same office with him have on more than one occasion represented powerful liquor interests. The inference is drawn that Britinger might be somewhat prejudiced in judging such a film as "John Barleycorn." It is only fair to Breitinger to say that there is little if any evidence to show that he represents liquor interests. It is impossible to say whether his professional affiliations have in any way influenced his action as a censor. The legal men behind this fight are strongly of the opinion that Breitinger would not have a leg to stand upon if he attempted to bring the promoters of this uncensored exhibition into court. From information which has reached me from reliable sources I believe that an attempt is to be made to smoke out the censors in Ohio somewhat in the same fashion which seems so effective in Pennsylvania. "John Barleycorn" will be shown without the permission of the Ohio censors. If an arrest follows, public opinion, it is expected, will be arrayed against censorship and strengthen the demand for the repeal of the obnoxious Ohio law.

Making and Breaking Laws

How One City Won Its Fight Against the Sunday Closing Law—A Familiar Story of Political Conniving.

SUNDAY performances in theaters were made an issue in Wenatchee, Washington, a thriving city of 5,000 inhibitants, and after contests in court and at the polls the playhouses now do business on Sabbath days. The court litigation, which involved the constitutionality of the city ordinance forbidding performances and motion pictures on Sundays, was decided against the theatrical proprietors; but they won their case before the people at a special election which recalled from office a majority of the council that enacted the so-called Sunday-closing law, and in the places of the ousted officials there were chosen successors who repealed the obnoxious legislation.

The Sunday theater opponents, prompted by two or three clergymen, organized themselves secretly; and, at the regular municipal election last December, there were councilmanic candidates who had pledged themselves, unknown to the public, to support a Sunday-closing ordinance. When the newly-elected council, which consisted of seven members, was installed early in January, two of the officials were found to be committed to closing theaters on Sundays. These two were helpless by themselves, but one of them, guided by a minister of the gospel, at once interested himself in a series of trades that eventually resulted in the enactment of his desired Sunday-closing law.

To get support for the anti-theater bill, this conniving councilman pledged himself to vote for the removal from office of the incumbent chief of police, and in return there was given the Sunday-closing measure the support of two other councilmen, one of whom was a personal enemy of the chief of police and the other of whom expected his father-in-law would be chosen as the new chief. With the two councilmen who were originally favorable to the anti-theater law and the two who were influenced by the trade on the chief of police, there were four councilmen, a majority of one, ready to enact the Sunday-closing measure; but, as the mayor was known to be opposed to such legislation and was sure to veto it, another councilman was required in support of the bill, so there would be five affirmative votes—two-thirds of the council—sufficient to pass the law over the executive's veto. Accordingly a councilman who sought the position of assistant city engineer for himself and who, to achieve his purpose, wanted a personal friend made city engineer, was persuaded to support the Sunday-closing bill in consideration that he should be allowed to name the city engineer.

By five against two votes, the anti-theater aw was enacted February 4. It was vetoed by the mayor who, in his message, stated that the ordinance was inspired by a few clergymen who expected its enforcement would increase the attendance and donations at church services. It was passed over the mayor's veto. It became law. The theaters closed Sundays.

Thereupon, J. E. Ferguson, of the Wenatchee theater, the leading motion picture and the only vaudeville house in the city, started suit in court to test the constitutionality of the ordinance and at the same time, under the law of the state of Washington, he initiated a movement for the recall of four of the five councilmen that voted to enact the Sunday-closing law.

The litigation over the constitutionality of the ordinance dragged slowly. The validity of the enactment was upheld in the superior court, from which an appeal was taken by Mr. Ferguson to the state supreme court. The supreme court, late in May, likewise found in favor of the legality of the law.

Separate, however, from the litigation involving the constitutionality of the ordinance, but almost as dilatory, was the movement for the recall of the four councilmen. They and the subordinate city officials, such as the city clerk and the city attorney, resorted to all sorts of tactics to delay and defeat the recall proceedings.

The charge against the four councilmen was vote-trading, and this was alleged to be such misfeasance and malfeasance in office as to warrant their recall. The city clerk, acting on the advice of the city attorney, refused to regard vote-trading as either misfeasance or malfeasance and declined to issue blank recall petitions. Thereupon, Mr. Ferguson, through his lawyers, applied to the superior court for a writ of mandamus to compel the clerk to issue the petitions. Following the hearing on the application, the court held that the trading of votes had been generally instead of particularly set forth, and that the clerk, in the absence of detailed allegations regarding the trading of votes, was justified in declining to issue bank recall petitions.

The charge was amended to meet the view of the court, and was a second time presented to the clerk. He again refused to issue the petitions. He was mandamused again, but this time, on a change of venue, before another judge, who held the charge sufficient.

As a consequence, the clerk had to issue the petitions. Within a week after he did so, they were returned to him with enough signatures to justify the calling of an election. At this juncture, one of the accused councilmen resigned office, and the other three accused councilmen went before a third superior court judge for an injunction to restrain the clerk from setting a date for the election, their plea being the same as was involved in the previous hearings—the insufficiency of the charge. In this action of the councilmen against the clerk they were represented by a private, and he by the city attorney. The plan of both sides was for the city attorney to make a losing defense for the clerk. Both sides vigorously resisted the entrance of Mr. Ferguson's lawyers into the case, but the judge recognized them as "friends of the court." The charge was again held sufficient, and the judge, though the councilmen took an appeal, refused to stay, pending the appeal, the calling of the election. The clerk fixed the date as far away as he possibly could under the law—May 5.

When the election was held, the appeal of the councilmen was still pending in the supreme court. Ultimately, the appellate tribunal decided against them, thereby establishing a precedent—namely, that vote-trading is malfeasance and and offense of such gravity as to warrant removal from office. At the polls, on May 5, by an overwhelming vote, the councilmen were recalled from office.

In the places of the resigned councilman and the three recalled councilmen, successors were named who immediately repealed the Sunday-closing ordinance.

The theaters have larger attendance Sunday evening than any other evening in the week. But Sunday business will have to be mighty good a long time before Mr. Ferguson recoups the expenditures he made over a period of five months to test the constitutionality of the closing law and to bring about the recall election. Altogether, his outlay amounted to $1,200 for attorney fees, court costs and election expenses, and to offset this sum he received in voluntary contributions.

MINDIL HAS PUBLICITY OFFICE.

Philip Mindil, who organized the publicity of the Mutual Film Corporation and who, according to Roy McCardell, of the New York World, "found press agentry a trade and raised it to an exact science," has opened a general publicity office of his own in the Times Building, New York. Associated with him is Robert S. Doman.

"Avenging Conscience"

D. W. Griffith's Remarkable Production in Six Parts for the Mutual Film Corporation Reflects the Spirit of Poe.

GRIFFITH has absorbed the whole spirit of Edgar Allen Poe and reflected it in "Avenging Conscience." Poe's remarkable genius, his rejection of customary forms, his crystalline imagery, his gloom, his grandeur, his abrupt transitions from scenes of exquisite beauty to those of ghastly horror, all the spell that transports us from the baseless fabric of a delicious dream to common and hideous reality, the marvels of his powers of contrast, dwelling one moment in a heaven of ideals and another in a hell of mental torture, are reproduced with marvelous fidelity on the screen. Griffith exhibits not only a sympathetic understanding of his subject from start to finish, but seems deeply sincere in his effort to perpetuate the genius of a man too harshly criticised because of his private errors, too little praised until this late day for his splendid public service.

Scene from "Avenging Conscience" (Reliance).

"Through many a night of want and woe
His frenzied spirit wandered wild
Till kind disaster laid him low
And Heaven reclaimed its wayward child.

Through many a year his fame has grown—
Like midnight, vast, like starlight sweet,
Till now his genius fills a throne
And nations marvel at his feet."

Eliminating from our minds the harsh opinions of what was the once popular conception of the man, one has only to look at portraits of Poe to feel that his dreamy soul was a sad one. His face is the embodiment of tragedy, with something of the dark fatalism in it that marked the countenance of Edwin Booth. His face is that of a poet, but drawn away from its mental sweetness by physical tendencies that are at once sensual, sorrowful and sepulchral.

It is so with "Avenging Conscience." Delighting you with its flashes of exquisite beauty at one moment, the very essence of spiritual charm, it moves you at another to pity and then to horror.

I can very easily see how such a photodrama would baffle a critic whose knowledge of Poe's works was either vague or superficial, but it did not baffle the vast audience that sat spellbound at the Strand during an appropriate presentation of the work. I feared that my own interest might be entirely that of a playwright in watching the constructive methods, so I looked around and listened to the occasional comments. The audience sat enthralled. An old lady back of me did not wholly grasp the meaning of Walthal's masterly portrayals of terror, but her escort swiftly explained. A stout gentleman next to me betrayed emotion during the sorrows of sweet Blanche. There were words of praise to be heard here and there, but the general tribute was a silent one, that of close attention, until the crisis was over, and there was generous applause all over the house at the conclusion.

Poe's strange fascination seems to lie in his handling of a primitive emotion, that of fear, which enlightenment has not wholly eliminated from our hearts. He could translate his thrill prose and he gave us a few exquisite examples of poetic genius. All that is in Griffith's "Avenging Conscience,"—all that and more. There is something in the photodrama that Poe's own works seem to lack, "The Message." There is a message in Annabel Lee—

"Our love was stronger far than the love
Of those who were older than we—
Of many far wiser than we."

But this message is only tinkled in the poem—it rings out clear and sweet in the screen story. And the big message, the grand theme fairly thunders, like the Strand's organ, in portraying the terror of them who usurp the privilege of Him who declared, "Vengeance is Mine," in the hollow of whose hand rests the sceptre which a certain plumed knight of Europe imagines belongs to him—to "Me und Gott."

Scene from "Avenging Conscience" (Reliance).

Never has a play driven home the lesson "Thou shalt not kill," as has "Avenging Conscience."

The story is "illustrative" and as such is eminently suited to screen visualization. It is that of an uncle who has set his heart on his nephew's literary success, who sees all his plans about to be thwarted on the verge of success by that little tyrant "Love." The clash between intellection and natural emotion results in a hypothetical series of dramatic incidents which can not be given in detail without spoiling the story for those who have yet in store the pleasure of seeing it. On that account, a synopsis of the action is omitted. The form and treatment are those of the screen alone, and the acting raises all five principals, in proportion to their relative importance, to a very high rank, that of veritable artists. Walthall and Blanche Sweet have as far exceeded themselves as to deserve the highest compliments on their work.

Poe professed to be an apostle of what was beautiful in art, and Griffith has taken him at his word. He has not faltered at the horrible, but he has more than balanced it with a long succession of beautiful scenes and a spiritual ending, whose daintiness barely saves it from being an anti-climax. Griffith depicts the horrible, but he overthrows it with scenes of delight that charm the senses, and moments of delicate humor in contrast with tender sentiment. It is such a tribute as any man of sympathetic appreciation would be glad to pay to him

"Whose soul went down to death in loneliness
A death too pitiful for aught save silence
Too mournful in its wretchedness for tears.
But not with death he dwells. Above his dust
Time's slow impartial hand has made for him
A shaft, memorial, builded of the stones
Which Hate and Envy cast upon his grave
He dwells not with the shadows."

Four Delightful Comedies

Cosmofotofilm Offers Comedies of Costermonger Characters from W. W. Jacobs' Stories, Produced by George L. Tucker.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

AT a time when many pictures are being made that are commercial imitators of former successes, anything with a fresh viewpoint and a new atmosphere is greatly to be desired. These four offerings of the Cosmofotofilm Company are full of the peculiar humor of W. W. Jacobs, a man who may be called the English counterpart of our O. Henry, but one whose way of looking at life is quite different. There is refreshing vigor in the situations he has drawn in three of these stories—one of them, "The Beauty and the Barge," is of slighter texture than the others—and in all the characters are, for the most part, new and very much alive. The four pictures get their best quality from these most entertaining characters. Each of them is convincing as a village "personage." Every community has one or two particularly interesting characters who furnish talk and entertainment to their neighbors, and Jacobs has a wonderful faculty of catching such in some characteristic pose and exhibiting them to us. George L. Tucker, whose work in picture making is well known here, has put them on the screen for us with a naturalness and truth that are sure to win warm commendation from spectators. The photography of all four pictures is clear and effective.

"The Bosun's Mate."

There's a good humorous situation in this single reel picture and it never fails to interest, chiefly because every yard of film is made to count; none of it is padding. The bosun "has his eye on a tavern landlady who needs a man to protect her." His croney, a retired soldier, comes along and the bosun pays him to play burglar in order that he may then rescue the landlady. She shows that she is in no need of protection and marries the soldier. Besides these three, there are four or five other characters that are well worth seeing; for every character in it affords good amusement. The action is natural and convincing. The staging and scenes are full of life and atmosphere, and the photography is all that could be desired.

"The Beauty and the Barge."

The barge of this single part picture is a sort of river sailboat, and its elderly captain is susceptible to the fair sex. There's a widow with "a line of rentable cottages" who wants him and he has engaged himself to her in spite of a gardener who is jealous and tells her about him. The captain is played by Cyril Maude, and he and the widow are the picture's center of interest. Another couple—the daughter of a major who hates naval men, and her beau, a young lieutenant on leave of absence from his ship—elope away on board the barge, leaving the captain on the bank and the widow chasing him along it. There are many excellent scenes, of a tavern, of the widow's home, of the barge, etc.; but the action, while nearly always of interest, is not so engrossing as in the other three pictures. The fine acting, the staging and photography make it a good offering.

"Lawyer Quince."

The central character of this one-reel rural love story is truly a village personage, a cobbler whose Solomon-like decisions are counted final by his neighbors. His son is in love with the pretty daughter of a farmer who wants her to marry someone better. The farmer catches the young people spooning in the barn and locks the boy up; then he gets the cobbler to make a hypothetical decision, all the time laughing in his sleeve. When the boy fails to come home to supper the cobbler begins to scratch his head. The way he solves the difficulty makes a tiptop ending to a good comedy. This picture is filled with worthwhile and naturally acted characters; the situation and the action are excellent, and it has been staged and clearly photographed in perfect background and sets. A very good offering.

Scene from "The Third String" (Cosmofotofilm).

"The Third String."

This is a two-part comedy with as little padding as any of the others and with more human substance that makes it the best offering of the four. The "third string" is probably the owner of "The Jolly Pilots," a tavern with a very pretty barmaid (Jane Gail). Two of the habitues fight a battle for her; but the owner marries her. An ex-prizefighter loves her; but she has tired of him. He is always waiting outside the tavern door and won't let the girl walk out with anyone else except him, so she's kept in. Ginger Dick also loves her; but is far from being of fighting timber. A couple of his friends get his photograph in fighting togs. He looks fierce and they name it the "Australian killer." The girl's old steady, the "basher," is going to kill Ginger; but the keeper of the inn arranges a regular mill with an—only implied—understanding that the girl will take the winner. He then persuades the basher that she will like him better if he loses. The fight is very amusing and the basher has a hard time getting knocked out. Everyone bets on him except the innkeeper, who gets all the money. Afterward the girl marries him. The producer and his players have put lots of real humanity in it all and have made a very desirable offering, clear and simple in its story, well staged and photographed.

"False Gods"

American

Reviewed by Jas. S. McQuade.

AN engrossing story, showing a man's baseness and his wife's saving nobility of character, has been filmed in two reels by the American, under the title of "False Gods," with Thomas Ricketts as directing producer.

The scenes are laid in the West and in fashionable Washington. The early ones show hardworking life on the farm and happiness, with little of the world's goods; the later are set amid wealth and honored position, yet clouded by dishonor that brings the wrongdoer to the verge of ruin and death. Though not at all didactic in treatment, the filmed story gives an impressive object lesson on the dangers to which some of our representatives are exposed in the national legislative assemblies at Washington, and on the swiftness of retribution after a man has once stooped to commit a crime.

A serious defect of the production—one, indeed, that raises a storm in the mind of the spectator, because it makes the story unconvincing—is the inappropriate costuming and make-up of Mary Kirk, by Miss Winifred Greenwood. John Kirk, her husband, who has become a millionaire and a Scene from "False Gods" (American).

United States Senator, keeps nagging his wife with the question, "Why don't you dress like other women?" Yet his wife is one of the most attractively gowned women at receptions. And she looks the most stunning, too! One rubs one's eyes and wonders what is the matter with John Kirk.

Nor is there any good reason why the bucolic John Kirk—with the smell of farm soil still fresh on his body—should set himself up as "arbiter elegantiarum." This is a fault of the scenario, however.

With the exception referred to, Miss Winnifred Greenwood sustains the part of Mary Kirk with her well-known art of characterization. John Steppling makes a capital John Kirk. Our old favorite, Ed. Coxen, as Bad Penny Tom, treats us to fine character work. Miss Josephine Ditt gives a strong, convincing portraiture of Estelle Wilson, adventuress and lobbyist, and George Field is just as effective in the part of Dick Baird, the partner in crime of Estelle.

John Kirk and his wife Mary work hard to make both ends meet on their little farm out West. Tom Fitch (Bad Penny Tom), a ranch hand, is obsessed by the desire to make a fortune as a prospector. Mary Kirk furnishes him with a grub stake out of her small savings, against the wishes of her husband. Tom gives her a signed document that her husband will get half of what he may make in the venture. He makes a rich strike, and soon afterwards he and the Kirk are millionaires.

John Kirk buys his way into the United States Senate. He is ashamed of his plain little wife's appearance, and leaves her at home, while he makes his residence in Washington. There he falls into the hands of Estelle Wilson and her companion, Dick Baird, who induce him to vote for a nefarious bill. This vote costs Kirk the respect and support of his constituents.

John Kirk does not stop after his first act of wrongdoing. He becomes infatuated with Estelle and secures a divorce from his wife, at the cost of half his fortune, in order to wed the adventuress. She and Baird work Kirk's ruin, and then she deserts him. He is about to commit suicide when Mary and Tom Fitch arrive in the nick of time and save him.

"Susanna's New Suit"

Beauty Film

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

A "BEAUTY" film, under the title of "Susanna's New Suit," fills a quarter of an hour divertingly and pleasantly. Margarita Fischer is, of course, the mainstay of interest and chief mirth producer.

The dainty comedienne has a strenuous time in trying to live up to the character of Susanna Van Dusen, a sprightly young wife who divides her affections among her husband, her mother and bargain gowns. To satisfy an inordinate desire to possess every natty dress that appeals to her, she sometimes finds it highly diplomatic to play her doting hubby against his mother-in-law, and her tears against both.

Scene from "Susanna's New Suit" (Beauty).

There are many Susannas, but it is questionable if there are any, even the most modern, that can come up to the stride of this Susanna. She has "gall" and "cheek" quite sufficient to disturb the peace of many homes, and yet winsome ways and looks that sway men's hearts as the wind does the aspen leaf. But she meets her Waterloo in this film comedy, although she does win out in the end—due to the distraction of hubby, who thinks her dead in a railroad wreck, when she has been fighting tooth and nail at a bargain sale, losing her purse and undergoing such rough usage in the melee that being in the railroad wreck might have been preferable.

So glad, indeed, is hubby over the fact that Susanna is alive, notwithstanding her fearfully "mussed-up" appearance, he takes her to his heart and whispers in her ear that he will buy her suits enough to last for a lifetime. The release date is August 11.

SIEVERS TAKES ALCO FEATURES.

Al. Lichtman, president of the Alco Film Company, has signed a contract with William Sievers, Secretary and General Manager of the New Grand Central Theater Company of St. Louis, whereby the latter company will handle the Alco program exclusively, in the states of Missouri, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska and southern Illinois.

The program will consist of one high-class feature a week, that will be a photo dramatization of a famous novel or play with well-known artists in the leading roles. This will be supplemented by one-reel comedies in which only famous comedians will appear.

A HUMANIZING and well-acted drama, "The Guiding Hand" gently reproves the selfishness of those whose circumstances should make them unselfish, but whose finer qualities have to be brought out in the crucible of bitter experience. The Stevens family, consisting of a wealthy business man engrossed in his work, his wife and their son, is representative in a way of many others in our civilization. The wife and son have no ideals, nothing to do, and the lack of work or incentive to work seems to exercise a demoralizing effect among the rich quite as much as among the poor. The wife is gambling at bridge whist to the extent of exchanging her jewels for paste imitations, while the son has become a chorus girl Johnnie and barroom sport of dress suit calibre.

The husband is strong, and in his strength is unsuspicious of the weaklings his wealth and indulgence has created. He is slightly bored when Mignon, a blind niece, becomes his charge, but he is not otherwise unkind to the helpless girl. The dense selfishness of both mother and son are exhibited in their early treatment of Mignon, but that mysterious sweetness of character which sometimes comes to the blind—perhaps in compensation for their affliction—is the ruling spirit in Mignon's character and she insensibly wins her way to the hearts of all in the household.

Stevens capitulates in a lonely moment to the blind girl's charm of simple goodness, and both his wife and son yield in time to an influence so gentle that it draws with invisible threads. The whole family is on the way to gradual betterment when a sudden impulse of the wayward son lays bare the wretched fabric of their social pretense. The boy attempts to steal his mother's jewels in the dead of night and is caught by the father. The latter's fury draws the mother, and then is made the humiliating discovery that her jewels, like her social position, are a hollow mockery, are a base imitation of the real thing.

Tragedy is very near when the blind girl, in an exquisite matinee of white silk, appears and succeeds in calming the infuriated husband and father until the whole incident can be hushed up. The story continues along well-known lines, during which the blindness is cured by the customary specialist, but it has obtained a strong grip in the beginning and sympathy holds through to the end. There is an exquisite purpose in the drama, and it is faithfully considered during most of the presentation. Mignon Anderson as the blind girl does not have to act—her sweetness is obvious—and she easily carries off the honors, though this not in detriment to the well-balanced cast. The story is clean, sympathetic and sure of an appeal to all classes.

Carlotta De Felice

CARLOTTA DE FELICE was brought up on milk—and pictures. Her father, the celebrated painter, Angelo de Felice, whose "Christian Martyrs" (posed for Miss de Felice's mother) for many years attracted art lovers' eyes in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, served her daily with perspective and color. When she grew up to be a little girl and later a big girl the artist and camera sought her early and often. It was a clear case of artistic eugenics.

Carlotta de Felice.

As one of the leading women of the Vitagraph Company, she earned the right to popularity by the beauty that Nature furnished and the acting ability that she developed for herself. In the Vitagraph production of "The Christian" she will be remembered as Polly Love. Her Madonna in "Christmas Story," and salient work in "Heart-ease," "Her "Sweetest Memories," "Mrs. Upton's Device," and others were of the quality to make her daddy feel proud of her.

In addition to being a leading woman, Miss de Felice is also a wife. James Keane is the discerning husband. But in casting her for the leading part in "Money," the massive six-reel feature production, Mr. Keane wasn't moved by husbandly affection. He's too good a business man not to pick actresses when he wants actresses.

"Money," made by the United Keanograph Film Co., of Fairfax, Cal., of which company Mr. Keane is president, general manager, author of the scenario and producer of the picture, wasn't especially written for her, but she couldn't have had a better part if it had been.

Looking natural in front of a camera isn't Miss De Felice's sole accomplishment. A French-Italian, according to her family tree she has the talents of both races. She can sing good enough to make a living at it if she wanted to, and as conversationalist she reminds one of Madame de Stael.

Most of her education she received abroad, but she doesn't rub it in by telling we Americans how inferior we are in the way of culture. She looks and talks 100 per cent. United States and if you tell her that George M. Cohan invented the Star Spangled Banner, she won't believe you.

"The Siren"

Henri Krauss of Jean Valjean Fame Has the Lead in This Notable Six-Part Eclectic Subject.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THE Eclectic Company is releasing "The Siren," a six-part production of the Paris Pathe company. In the hands of an ordinary company the subject might have proved an ordinary picture. In the hands of this great cast certainly it is a great picture. At the head is Henri Krauss, who for many years to come will be remembered by picture lovers as the superb Jean Valjean of Pathe's "Les Miserables." In "The Siren" Mr. Krauss divides the interest and the honors with Mlle. Mistinguett, who will also be remembered as the daughter of the Thenardiers in the dramatization of Hugo's story. Another great player is Mlle. Cecile Guyon, who sustains the role of the wife of the fisherman Pierre. So, too, there is Paul Capellani in the part of Pierre.

Scene from "The Siren" (Eclectic).

"The Siren" is a story for adults. It is a tale of a coquette who from unaccountable motives marries a doctor much older than herself and when detected in unwifely conduct promptly moves to Paris and becomes a courtesan. Fernande beyond question is a plain-faced woman; but the seeming handicap is more than counterbalanced by her compelling manner with men—her vivacity, freedom, abandon; her boldness and commanding resourcefulness. She brings to her feet and easily controls the Parisian men of the world; but she meets her match in a little fishing port of Brittany. Pierre, lusty and simple, is made to feel the lure of the siren. He is not of the same clay as are the wise men of Paris. He takes seriously the attentions of the woman who looks upon him as one who will amuse her on a holiday. He comes nearer to winning Fernande than has any of his predecessors, but his partial triumph brings about the tragic death of the siren at the hands of the mother of Pierre, crazed by the humiliation to which the fisherman has subjected his wife.

Mr. Krauss as Dr. Williams holds the sympathy from the first. It is in a professional way that he meets Fernande—he is called in to attend her father. His grief at the discovery of his wife's probable indiscretion is moving. His rage and humiliation as it is borne in on him later that his worst fears are but the truth are wonderfully portrayed. His confrontation of the heartless wife and his sudden departure from the house through fear that he will slay her constitute one of the dramatic episodes of a play containing many strong situations. Matching it in depth is his meeting with Fernande late in the story. He has agreed to go with an old friend to endeavor to overcome the infatuation of a son for a bad woman. He finds his wife. She pleads with the doctor, she puts her arms about his neck—and he yields to his old love, only to be ridiculed.

The story is not all gray in its color. There are lighter touches, as, for instance, when Fernande, in Paris, is surrounded by her wildly competing admirers. Her affections are of the moment and are transferred from one to the other without apparent rhyme or reason. Her dancing provides unexpected entertainment. Also her simulated drowning when, clad in her one-piece bathing suit, in waist-deep water she calls to Pierre to save her, may provoke a smile.

Miss Guyon has scant opportunity for revealing her splendid talent. She makes much of that, however. The mother of Pierre is a virile figure, just as the sort of mother one would expect of such a son. When she seizes a mallet and batters out the life of the woman who has done her best to break up her daughter-in-law's home she furnishes the culminating tragedy. It is consistent with the lovable character of the old doctor that, under the plea of the unwritten law he has taken the life of an unfaithful spouse, he assumes the blame for a crime he was powerless to prevent.

If "The Siren" be strong stuff, it is powerfully presented.

FRANK McGLYNN.

A NATIVE of San Francisco, the home of the stage genii, Frank McGlynn in early life leaped into prominence in the theatrical world by his clever performance of Clon, the dumb spy in the Frohman production, "Under the Red Robe." Later he joined the Henry Miller Company and played "De Farge" in "The Only Way." McGlynn made his entrance into the motion picture field with the Edison Company in the year 1909 and has appeared in character and heavy roles in numerous films. In the fall of last year he left the company in order to accompany the Giants and White-Sox in their trip around the world. With Victor Miller as his cameraman he directed the pictures of the baseball games played in the different countries visited and also played the part of the "baseball bug" who had worked his way into the game and could be found in the bleachers rooting for his home team. By his cheerful disposition and genial nature he became a great favorite of John McGraw, the little Napoleon of baseball, and all his staff of players. He was known as "Happy McGlynn" during the trip, which lasted four months, seventy-three days of which were spent on the water.

McGlynn has returned to the Edison Studio and is busily engaged in portraying those difficult character roles which have gained him many admirers among the people who delight in the histrionic film.

PRICKING some of the many weak spots in human nature, "Buxom Country Lass" ridicules human pretense through a series of amusing incidents. Wood B. Wedd is still in search of a wife and imagines that he has found a very desirable article in the Country Lass, a rather mature one, particularly as she owns a farm in her own right. He pictures, as has many a contemplative matrimonial aspirant before him, that marriage with a woman of property means a release from responsibility and the worry of self-maintenance. In fact, Wood B. is a very human young man, a type of almost as many as are now wearing last year's straw hats.

The Country Lass accepts his proposal of marriage with a proviso: he must show that he can do one day's chores and work on the farm. Wood B. is slightly disturbed at the prospect, but he is not discouraged. He has a "fidus achates," one of those faithful friends who are willing to help out in an emergency, by the name of Darby Jenks. A deep-laid scheme is formulated to magnify the efforts of Wood B. by secretly supplementing them so as to make a decided impression on the Country Lass. Wood B. appears in person at supper time and undertakes the job. It begins at three next morning, when he is aroused from deep sleep to water the horses, milk the cows, chop wood and start the kitchen fire before breakfast.

The antics of Wood B. and Darby Jenks are amusing, without straining for effect. There is, indeed, quite a homely little lesson in the labor these two attempt to perform, a glimpse of why boys leave the farm. The men who are attempting to fool the Country Lass encounter their most amusing difficulties in searching for fresh eggs. Darby's suspicions are aroused by what he hears in one; he opens it piece by piece, shown in small scope, and a little chick steps out of the fresh egg. Other fresh eggs, left for a few minutes in a basket on the wash boiler are transformed to chicks, and Wood B.'s pretentious cheat is finally discovered.

It is a very small but very lively cast. Houseman and Wadsworth prove to be a funny team, a screen Weber and Fields, in their solemn stupidity, and Cora Williams performs her small role with credit. "Buxom Country Lass" is a simple and homely little comedy, but it will bring more than one spontaneous laugh, while offending none.

The Moving Picture of the Future

Romaine Fielding, Lubin Producer, Says Time Is Coming When There Will Be a Director of Directors.

"TEN years ago you could not have dreamed, to say nothing of predicting, that the very cream of the speaking actors and actresses of this country and abroad, would have abandoned their old profession to appear in the silent drama, before that grim recorder, the camera," says Romaine Fielding, Lubin star.

"Almost any prediction may be made today, as to the development in motion pictures during the next ten years, and without fear of question. The day has gone by for good, when any actor with a few years' experience may aspire to the directorship of a company. The up-to-date director must study, and study hard. Above all else, he must be a post-graduate in human nature to know accurately the limitations of the human material he is working and to realize its expansive quality likewise.

Romaine Fielding.

"Of course, of the routine and the technical he must be a past grandmaster. While the mechanical improvements will be made by leaps and bounds, so will the directing end. The time is not far distant when there will be created a general director of directors. This will bring about greater uniformity and cohesiveness. It will weed out some of the careless workers and strengthen some who are now weak. The public will reap the benefit. It is anything but a veritable playground, for the conscientious director. Many uninformed think his lot an ideal one. The old axiom 'Look before you leap' applies most truthfully to the actor in moving pictures.

"The profession is not the 'bed of roses' so many think it and are taught to believe. I try to impress on those actors whom I direct one very important fact, 'Ask, if you are in doubt,' or 'Look before you leap.' That facilitates the production, saves the disposition of the director, and, to be more practical, economizes time and avoids the wasting of film. There are millions of dollars destroyed on N. G. scenes through the stupid interpretation of half-baked actors, who haven't the sense when uncertain to ask the director what he desires.

"But then, none of us is perfect, but to get somewhere near the goal of perfection we are striving to attain is an interesting game."

"The Oath of a Viking"

Picture Playhouse Film Company Offers an Interesting Subject Based on the Lore of the Norseman.

MANY wildly beautiful scenes of rugged coast and turbulent seas lend artistic value to a coming release of the Picture Playhouse Film Company entitled "The Oath of a Viking," a three-part subject dealing with a story of the ancient Norsemen. There are many stories of this character which should make good pictures, but this one is the first that has been produced by an American company.

According to the story a Viking and his band of followers, sojourning in summer camp, are visited by Olaf, son of a neighboring king, who has fled from his own country because of some infraction of its laws. With the band is the daughter of the Viking, Lydia. Her loveliness causes Olaf to seek to marry her. The girl is in love with Nordo, one of her own tribe, so she rejects Olaf's proposals. Whereupon Olaf offers to fight any one for the right to marry her. Nordo is selected and Olaf is defeated.

Later, when a messenger comes from the father of Olaf demanding that he be returned for punishment for his offense, Olaf escapes. Under the taunts of the messenger the viking swears to produce Olaf alive or to sacrifice his daughter to Odin. From his hiding place Olaf hears the oath and plans revenge against Nordo and Lydia. Again the hunt for Olaf begins. Nordo finally overtakes him and in the encounter Olaf is hurled over a cliff into the sea where he simulates death so successfully that Nordo is compelled to tell the Viking that he killed Olaf.

Reminded of his oath the old viking prepares to fulfill it and, with appropriate ceremonies Lydia is cast into the sea. Nordo has prepared for this emergency and rescues the girl, keeping her in hiding.

Believing that Lydia is dead, Olaf enters the camp of the viking to taunt his enemies. While this is happening Nordo sees Olaf in the camp and hastens to return with Lydia. The viking is overjoyed to find that his daughter is alive and he blesses her espousal with Nordo, who saved her life.

The costuming of the players is in keeping with preconceived ideas of the Norsemen; there is a-plenty of action to hold the interest. Light effects have been used to heighten some of the scenes and there is an under water scene that is as beautiful as it is novel. The leading characters were taken by James Gordon, who plays the Viking, E. A. Turner is Nordo and Betty Harte is a lovely Lydia. The release date is August 10.

THERE has seldom been seen in New York a more beautiful girl than Miss Naomi Childers, better known as the "Grecian Girl" of the Vitagraph Company. Not only is her beauty a thing to wonder at, but it is enhanced by her modest demeanor and charming personality. Under the direction of Captain Lambert, of the Vitagraph Company, she has risen rapidly into moving picture prominence during the last year, and is now one of the leading women of the company.

Some of the greatest artists have painted and modeled her, enraptured with the purity of her Grecian type. In St. Louis, of which city she is a native, she was in great request for society functions, at which she gave classic readings and dances. She was widely known for these accomplishments both East and West, and deservedly popular whereever she shed the light of her loveliness and charm. It was with reluctance that her many friends at St. Louis heard of her decision to come to New York, but they have followed her career with pleasure, and gloried in her successes.

Miss Naomi Childers' principal achievements on the film screen, for which she has posed during the last year, are: "Hearts of Women," "Price of Vanity," "The Crucible of Fate" and "The Spirit in the Clay." On August 20 she will be seen in a comedy entitled "The Woes of a Waitress" and on August 31 in a comedy "The Wrong Flat."

SCHWERIN BUILDING NEW HOUSE.

C. F. Harry R. Raver

Interesting Sketch of One of the Busy Men in the Motion Picture Business—A Long Amusement Record.

HARRY R. RAVER, ex-traveling motion picture exhibitor, press representative for carnival and exposition attractions, promoter and manager of street fairs and fall festivals on a large scale; sales manager, scenario reader and publicity dopester for many film companies; manager of film exchanges and theatres, and now the leading figure in a half dozen enterprises of importance, has always been a warm friend of the critic and struggling news-gatherer on trade and amusement journals and throughout his entire career there has never been a change of attitude toward "the boys."

Raver has been asked for a photograph for publication many times, but his answer has always been:

"Devote the space to the company; I don't believe in personal boosting when my associates are doing their share of the work."

At any rate, Harry Raver's experiences are worth recording. They cannot be covered here in full, but a brief summary of his career tells this much:

Hailing from Youngstown, Ohio, at the age of thirteen, Raver decided to join a circus in spite of his pious father's and mother's wish that he remain at school and later educate himself for the ministry. But the wanderlust was in his blood and, in spite of frequent journeys home to partake of the fatted calf, he got his gait finally and was able to eke out an existence as museum lecturer and general amusement "handy Andy," until 1899, when he joined Bostock's Zoo at the Philadelphia exposition. There he was transferred from the front of the show on the midway to the publicity department. Bostock was noted for his high class methods of reaching the columns of the press, so Raver's schooling was of the best. His work among the schools of Philadelphia brought nearly every pupil to the Bostock attractions without even distributing a handbill at the school house gate.

Harry R. Raver.

Lubin operated his "Cineograph Theatre" on the same midway that year and did a tremendous business. Raver decided to buy a machine and some films, and he did. "May Irwin and John Rice Kiss," "Street Scene in New York," "Birth of Venus," "Sappho Kiss," "Shooting the Chutes," "Unlucky Fisherman" and other features of the day were among the lot. Then he joined a repertoire company playing at 10-20-30. He ran his machine between acts, played small parts, hustled props and sang illustrated songs for a whole season without drawing a cent of salary.

When he found this didn't pay, Raver found a partner and, just following McKinley's assassination, took out the "McKinley Pictures" with other novelties, playing the Middle West theaters with success. Carnivals were becoming popular and black tents for showing pictures in the day time were being used. Raver joined a carnival company and later the Parker shows. Here he gave Parker the title "Amusement King" and made him famous all over America as "The man who rose in ten years from a court house janitor to the world's greatest carnival showman."

Parker grew until he had over 100 cars and more than 1,000 people. Raver leased a 25-car outfit from him and in sixty weeks did a gross business of over $200,000. Raver took his profits and lost them in the hotel and jewelry business in Dakota and Iowa during the following year. "Bill" Swanson was an old carnival friend of Raver's and when he learned the latter was foot-loose wrote him to come on to Chicago and learn the exchange business. Raver did publicity work for Swanson, managed his chain of theatres, supported two families meanwhile, finally going to Omaha to take charge of Swanson's exchange at that point. Then he went to Washington in a similar capacity and later landed in Baltimore, where he operated the first of the chain of Consolidated Film & Supply Co.'s offices. Raver later promoted and organized the Motograph Co. of America and built a model studio and laboratory at Baltimore in 1908. Then he came to New York to study politics and secure a market. His personality made itself aparent to such an extent that he was elected secretary and treasurer of the Associated Independent Film Manufacturers, which, after a strenuous fight wormed its way into the Moving Picture Sales Co. and Raver had a selling franchise and became a director on the board.

Patent litigation scared Raver's capital in Baltimore and he lost his franchise in the Sales Co. He could not release films. Then he worked as sales manager for the Yankee Film Co. and the Atlas Co. until Doctor Cook "discovered the Pole," when he exploited perhaps the first dramatic subject ever sold on a state rights basis: "The Truth About the Pole."

The American Eclair was being launched and Raver was engaged as sales manager. In two weeks he was promoted to the position of general manager and again became a director of the Sales Co. A split was inevitable and the Film Supply Co. of America came into existence with ten manufacturers. Raver was elected secretary and became a stockholder. He also managed the business successfully until another split occurred, which formed the Mutual on one side and the Exclusive Supply Corporation on the other. The latter handles features only. Raver is now part owner of the Exclusive. A year ago he formed the All Star Feature Corporation to produce well-known plays with well-known stars. He did his own publicity work, answered all letters and managed to sell every territory in the United States and Canada for every All Star film for a solid year, and accomplished this before "Arizona," the first release, was completed. This stands as a record for salesmanship hard to beat.

Raver has been a stockholder and director general of the Itala Film Co. for two years. During this time he has been urging the parent firm in Turin to concentrate on one massive film. "Cabiria" is the result of his persistency and the whole world is now sounding its praises. Raver wanted President Wilson to see "Cabiria" and he talked it over with Augustus Thomas. The film was shown at the White House to the whole Cabinet and their wives. Raver said he would give "Cabiria" a premier that would "knock 'em off their feet," and he did. It cost a pretty penny to secure the grand ballroom of the Hotel Astor, an organist, special music arrangement by Manuel Klein, elaborate souvenir booklets for the invited guests and dinner for his friends after the exhibition. Then he opened at the Knickerbocker, after vainly trying to secure the Metropolitan Opera House. For eight weeks Raver's friends have hesitated to ask for complimentaries. Selling out every night at 25 cents to $1.00 a seat and duplicating the New York success in six other cities.

Raver's showmanship is easily apparent in his handling of this big film.

CONSULAR REPORTS ON EDUCATIONAL FILMS.

The regular reports which come from the United States Consuls in various parts of the world are not only always interesting, but form a safe guide for manufacturers and agents to follow, the particulars being authentic.

ITALY (Consul Perry—Turin).

"In the city of Turin, Department of Piedmont, Italy (population 440,000), there are 76 motion picture theaters, which may be divided into three groups. Theaters of class one, 2 in number, accommodate about 1,000 persons each; of class two, 9 in number, 500 each; and of class three, 65 in number, 300 each. Turin is one of the most important film centers of the world, and practically all manufacturers are represented here, either by direct agencies or exchange bureaus. Paris and Rome, with their important film production, are only a few hours distant.

"The class of film most popular for this locality is the sentimental or romantic, involving a love theme, or the picturesque Indian or cowboy film, and all reading matter must, of course, be in Italian. Films of nearly every make in the world are shown here, although very naturally those made in Turin predominate. American films are known in this market, but have not a large sale. No prejudice exists against them, and it is simply a question of desirable subject matter and a satisfactory price.

"As previously mentioned, there are eight film manufacturers located in Turin; in the rest of Italy there are nine at present—four at Rome, two at Milan, one each at Naples, Catania and Velletri. Two additional companies are contemplated at Turin and one each at Rome, Naples and Genoa, so that in six months' time there should be 22 manufacturers in all Italy, with 10 located in Turin. Several articles have been written in an effort to introduce the use of the cinematograph into public schools and other educational institutions, but up to the present time very little has been actually accomplished."

The great value of more profitable agricultural pursuits shows the Yankee-like wideawakeness of the Italians:

"The Agrarian Co-operative (Mutual) Association of Rome has organized, by means of motion pictures, a very thorough propaganda of agricultural co-operation. Free shows, beginning October 1, 1914, will be given in all the principal agricultural centers of Italy and will depict scenes that demonstrate the advantages of mutual co-operative assistance which will insure against losses conected with agriculture, etc. So far motion pictures have not been introduced into schools or educational institutions of this vicinity; some schools and colleges make arrangements with cinemas to give special shows for scholars on certain days."

There is no doubt that some American pictures of Western implements and methods could be shown in all parts of Italy for both educational and commercial advantage, the publication of this consular report may therefore lead to mutual advantage in this respect.

RUSSIA (Consul Snodgrass—Moscow).

"The majority of the films used in Russia are of foreign manufacture and include the Pathe, Nordisk, Cines, Gaumont, Gloria, Deutscher Bioscop, Eclair, Itala, Echo, Ambrosio, Denmark, Tanagra, Continental, Film d'Art Vitagraph, Eclipse, Milano and others. A few years ago various American films were shown in Moscow, such as the Biograph, Lubin, Essanay, etc., and proved very popular, and it is thought that they would be much in demand if introduced again in this district. The duty on imported films is 39.9 cents per pound. They are shipped in tin boxes and then forwarded by parcel post.

"Motion pictures have recently been introduced into schools and other educational institutions, and it is believed that this branch of the business would offer the best opportunities to foreign firms desirous of entering the motion picture field in Russia. Such institutions are not bound, as other exhibitors are, to rent for a given period at a stated price from a particular firm. Would-be exporters of films should bear in mind, however, that the Russian regulations concerning censorship differ considerably from those of other countries, one of the first stipulations here being that the films do not contain scenes which show a lack of respect to the imperial family; then they must not contain allusions or scenes which would offend the religious feelings and beliefs of the people, in consequence of which no pictures depicting sacred rites, showing holy images, saints, etc., are allowed. The exactions regarding pictures that tend to violate the laws of decency and propriety are similar to those in other countries."

From the body of these reports it appears that children are well cared for in the countries which are here named. Either special exhibitions are given for them or they are frequently given such programs as may be suitable for the parents and guardians to take their young charges.

SPAIN (Consul Dumont—Madrid).

"The films most in favor are those made up from historical novels or incidents, such as 'Quo Vadis,' 'The Three Musketeers,' 'Spartacus,' etc., following which come war, cowboy (American), detective, and intrigue films, then scenic, comic, educational, chases, etc. The reading matter and announcements must always be in Spanish. Many makes of films from Europe and the United States are in use, but the French and Italian predominate. The only American films in great favor are those showing far-West scenes with cowboys and particularly Indians. Spanish children, who form half of the audiences, are extremely fond of Indian scenes. Other American films, such as comic, drama, etc., are considered crude in gestures and actions compared with similar films from European manufacturers. Films showing weekly current events all over the world usually have one or two American scenes.

"Educational films are little used. At the great universities occasional exhibitions are given by some lecturer, but none at the public schools. There are no trade papers devoted to motion picture interests, and but two manufacturers of films in this consular district, which comprises nearly half of Spain. Of the two, Pathe Freres take Spanish scenes of all kinds, while the Union Cinematografica takes bullfights only."

In Malaga the consul reports "Educational and industrial films are exhibited from time to time and are reported to be fairly popular."

SWITZERLAND (Consul Holland—Basel).

Makes of films now being shown are Gaumont, Pathe, Eclipse, Pasquali, Bioscope, Edison, Imp, Eiko, Mester and Projektion. Rental prices for films vary. For the better grade of films 4 cents a foot is paid for the first week, with a declining scale to one-fourth of 1 cent a foot for the last week. The average lease for a film is for 10 weeks, 15 weeks being the maximum. In some cases where there is a demand for special features as much as 10 to 15 cents a foot is paid per week for films.

"Motion pictures have not been generally introduced into schools and other educational institutions except in cases of medical and geographical demonstrations. A cantonal law is being prepared restricting the admittance of children to motion picture theaters. Some Swiss cantons have already enacted restrictive measures. One theater in Basel censors its own films and does not permit children to see pictures indiscriminately."

NOTES.

Children everywhere will be pleased with the forthcoming Edison series of the famous Buster Brown; this extraordinary youngster of course could not long stay off the screen, and we may expect that he will be given a much larger lease of life than ever before, he stands a fair chance of going round the world now, with the faithful Tige as famous as himself.

Gold and Diamonds, and then Diamonds and Gold, riches unfold are soon to be released free for everybody—on the screen—with a temptation impossible to comply with, for these riches are in far away South Africa. The Edison company has filmed the mines of Kimberly and Pretoria where the "blue earth" yields up its glistening secrets, and the Transvaal gold field with its Rand mine producing more gold than any other similar section in the world.

The topical films continue to grow in power of usefulness as well as in popularity, with Pathe as the pioneer, and with followers of no mean order the news of the world in picture is now one of the most educating parts of the moving picture success. The exhibitor who does not run a regular series of these subjects is behind the times and does not deserve the support of those who want the best in pictures. Wherever there is a picture house these pictures should be shown and the school children should almost be compelled to see them.

"Time, Faith and Patience work wonders." This is the motto of a fabled fairy god-mother in the story books of old. It is a good and safe motto to be written over everything that is good. Four years ago we wrote asking that the children be given special attention in the coming uses of the moving pictures; this was at the time when the cry was to keep the children from the picture houses as from some foul or loathsome place. Thanks to the educative forces of the pictures this has all changed. Time has eradicated the evil; Faith in the power of the picture has been more than justified, while Patience has "had her perfect work." One of the most common reports gathered from newspaper clippings from all parts of the United States is the special and careful provision now being made for children, they are evidently being given first thoughts. In the moving picture world as in religious and secular education it is being proved that the good of the children is the good of all. The house or the program that provides for the children is assured success from first to last.

The latest and one of the best combinations yet made for educational kinematography, is that between Chautauqua and the moving pictures; there are no two forces working for the highest and broadest and most widespread educational development than these two, that they will richly supplement each other is a foregone conclusion to all acquainted with the workings of each. The managers of Chautauqua recently had the Pathe Company take pictures of the original Chautauqua surroundings with its picturesque bluffs and general atractive scenery. In the Chautauqua lecture circuit the moving picture will prove one of the greatest and most valuable additions, for it is here in the highest realms of educational work that some of the best illustrative teaching can be done, more than this there are no educational forces at work which will prove more appreciative of the value of the moving picture than those of the Chautauqua circle; their uses will prove also a great incentive to the more immediate uses of the moving picture in all classes of educational work, hastening the too long delayed time marked for the adoption of the moving pictures in schools everywhere.

"ANIMATED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE."

As its name implies, it is an Animated Magazine of 6,000 feet "issued" every six weeks, starting October 5, and exhibited in 1,800 parish halls and church basements in the United States and Canada; and later in foreign countries. Each "issue" of the "Magazine" will feature the "Lives of the Saints" in 3,000 feet, and besides will have 1,000 feet of a Modern Catholic drama; 1,000 feet of an Historical Catholic episode; 400 feet of Catholic chronology, and 600 feet of good, clean farce comedy. The enterprise has the sanction and authorization of leading eminent priests, and will be shown Cardinals Gibbons, Farley and O'Connell before it is sent out for presentation, thus eliminating the chance of any matter of an un-Catholic nature creeping into the "issue."

The "Magazine" is the product of the Emerson-Currier Cinematograph Corporation, with offices at 1449 Broadway, makers of the "EESEE" films, and incorporated under the laws of the State of New York for $50,000, with the following officers: William D. Emerson, president and general manager; George R. White, vice-president; Bernard P. Currier, secretary, and J. Hugh Fish, treasurer. The firm will feature Mabel Emerson, late of American, Atlas, Columbia and Canadian Bioscope; supported by Latona Currier, Orette Alretus, late of Kalem and American; Frederick Bernard, late of Selig Polyscope, American, Kalem, etc.; Hugh Fish, late star of "The Collegians"; Bert Currier, and other equally well-known players. The productions will be under the personal direction of William D. Emerson, late of American, Atlas, Columbia and Canadian Bioscope, who devised and directed the following Features for those firms: "Geronimo's Last Raid," "Andrew Jackson," "Father Marquette," "The Story of Starved Rock" (the last three being made while in camp with 45 persons at historic Starved Rock in central Illinois); "Secret Service Steve," "The Midnight Ride of Paul Revere," "The Hidden Hand," "The Midnight Express," "From Sing Sing to Liberty," "The Great Taxi-Cab Mystery," "In the Enemy's Power," etc., etc., assisted by George R. White, well and favorably known in moving picture circles in and about Greater New York.

"The Old Army Coat"

Two Parts—Kalem Company.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS short but compact feature gives the Kalem star, Alice Joyce, an opportunity for an appeal to the heart and she makes the most of the opportunity as was to be expected.

An old confederate soldier, the uncle of a worthless spendthrift nephew, is passing his declining years in the company of his ward, a charming young woman, the granddaughter of the old man's sweetheart. The latter in the early days of the civil war had refused the veteran and married another man, who fell in battle. In the course of time the veteran chooses the grandaughter for his steady companion. The old soldier discovers the utter worthlessness of his nephew and decides to disinherit him, bequeathing all his property to his ward. Death comes upon him suddenly after he has made his will and the ward, fearing that in the excitement following her guardian's death the will might fall into the hands of the nephew hides the document in her guardian's old army coat. A passing tramp steals the coat and, as the will cannot be found, the nephew is declared the old man's heir and takes possession of the estate. In the mean time the lawyer who had drawn the will is sorely puzzled but gives up his investigation after a little effort. In its wanderings the army coat falls into the hands of a farmer, who uses it as a scarecrow on his fields. The ward, now a school teacher in the country, hides behind the scarecrow to escape the annoying attentions of the nephew and thus discovers the precious document which, despite winds and storms, is well preserved and leads to the true heir taking the property away from the villainous nephew.

ACQUITTED OF DISCRIMINATION.

On July 29 a jury in the Recorder's Court at Rochester, N. Y., acquitted J. J. Farran, manager of the Colonial theater in that city, of the charge of violating the State Civil Rights Law. The action was brought at the instance of Frank Tress, an Italian, who claimed that Manager Farran discriminated against him in compelling him to occupy a seat in the gallery of the Colonial. In its defense the Colonial Theater Company brought out the fact that the seat in the gallery occupied by Tress was as good as any seat on the first floor, also that there was no discrimination against him because he was an Italian.

Five actions of this character have been brought against the Colonial Theater management during the past month and in only one has a verdict been obtained against it, and when the jury awarded the complainant $100. This case has been appealed.

Standardization and the Motion Picture Camera

By Frank M. Byam.

THE establishing of a definite universal standard of film perforation is a matter of the first importance to all who are engaged in the motion picture business. But there are other problems that deserve serious consideration. If there were set up a formally established perforation gauge, it would still be necessary to standardize certain features of camera and printer construction and operation.

Painstaking care and fidelity to detail must mark every process in the making and displaying of the motion picture. Of these processes none is of greater relative importance than the printing of the film. The best work of the camera may be robbed of half its value by careless or imperfect printing; or indifferent negatives may be made to produce good pictures by exercising intelligence and care in printing. Since the process is important, it should be simplified as far as possible by the use of properly-designed machines —and by standardization. An ideal equipment would be one consisting of perforators, printers and cameras, the film-movement mechanism of all of which should be built to conform to the same perforation gauge. But machines so standardized would not remove all the difficulties that stand in the way of perfect printing. One of these difficulties arises from the failure of camera manufacturers to agree upon a uniform point on the film at which the pictures should start.

Some cameras are so constructed that the picture begins on a line drawn across the film through the perforations. In others, the start is made from a line set midway between the perforations. The choice as between the two points in no way affects the taking of the pictures. But when, in the making up of the negative film, strips of film on which the pictures start from a line midway between the perforations are mixed with strips on which the line goes through the perforation, the way is open for trouble in printing and projection. So far as printing is concerned, the frame may be changed to suit the changes in the film, and errors in printing thus reduced to the minimum. But this confusion of standards lessens the efficiency of the printing department, and the positive print reproduces the errors, whether they are few or many, so that they appear upon the screen. A careful operator may, by frequent changes in the framing of his picture, get fair results from such a film. But no operator—no matter how competent he may be—can wholly overcome the disadvantages which arise from failure to standardize the processing of the film. The remedy lies with the camera builders, who should agree upon a definite uniform point on the film at which all pictures should start.

In support of the method of starting the pictures at a point on a line drawn across the film, midway between the perforations, it is urged that:

This method facilitates splicing, because the film joinder extends from side to side of the film without interruption.

The splice is stronger than it would be if the cut were made through the perforations, because the perforations are surrounded by two thicknesses of film at the splice.

This method of splicing aids in bringing the film to a perfect register for printing, by presenting a perfect perforation on each side of the film at the point of splicing.

While something may be said in support of each of the methods of establishing a point at which the picture should start, it is conceded that the thing of first importance is to establish the starting point and then to adhere strictly to the method adopted, whichever it may be.

At present, some manufacturers of cameras do not follow either of these methods of starting the picture, but let the line fall where it will. And the problem is still further confused by the use of the cheap and inferior cameras with which the market has been flooded in recent years. The character of the construction of many of these cameras is such that even if they were to be adjusted to a given standard as to the starting of the picture, they could not be depended on to maintain that standard. Too little attention has been paid to this question of camera construction. No matter what the name of the camera may be or what may be claimed for it, it should be made to measure up to certain standards of efficiency before it is accepted as a means of making motion pictures. This criticism is not aimed at cameras of whatever type that have proved their worth in the motion picture studios of the world, but rather at the instruments which have been tried and found wanting. While cheapness has been found to be coupled with inefficiency throughout the motion picture field, it has been clearly demonstrated that motion picture machinery must—in design and construction—maintain the highest standard of efficiency, if the mechanical development of the motion picture business is to keep abreast of its artistic development.

The question of standardization may well receive careful consideration at the hands of men who believe that the motion picture business—great as it is—is greater still in its possibilities of growth. And in the solution of this problem, as of all problems connected with the motion picture business, increased attention should be paid to those whose approval may be understood but whose criticisms are only guessed at—the patrons of the motion picture theater. Standardization, and indeed improvement in all directions, may be urged on behalf of the maker of film, the manufacturer of motion pictures, the builder of projectors and the exhibitor. But the real "persons at interest" are, after all, the men and women and the boys and girls who patronize the motion picture theater. They are paying the bills of the motion picture business and are entitled to receive full value for their investment. They are constantly growing more discriminating. They will find a way by which to make their criticisms heard and heeded unless, indeed, the evolution of the perfect picture is hastened by the men who have assumed the responsibility for the making of it.

Gaston Bell

GASTON BELL, of the Lubin Company, was born in Boston of English parents. He was educated in his native town and was a choir boy under Warren A. Lock, of Harvard College. His first appearance on the stage was as a Spanish boy in the opera "Carmen," with Marie Tempest. He did not follow the stage until he had finished his studies and then for two years in New York he prepared for the stage. His first engagement was with Daniel Frawley in his stock company in the West. He has played many parts in the last twelve years, among them Little Billie in "Trilby," with the all-star cast, in New York; "Brewster's Millions," with Edward Abeles; "Julie Bon Bon," with Louis Mann and Clara Lipman; the Columbia Stock Company in Washington, the Shubert Stock Company in Brooklyn, in vaudeville in several sketches, and in productions under Charles and Daniel Frohman; his last being in "The Seven Sisters," under Daniel Frohman, with Charles Cherry and Laurette Taylor, playing Baron Gida. He then went into pictures at the Majestic, then with Marion Leonard playing leads, and then for a year with Kinemacolor as leading man. "Nathan Hale" was one of his biggest pictures at that time. He is at Lubin's now, under Barry O'Neil, in featured plays, such as "The Third Degree, "The Lion and the Mouse," "The Gamblers," "The Wolf" and "The House Next Door." His hobby, aside from his work, is the country with his dog, at his summer home in New Jersey.

LEHRMAN STARTS PRODUCTION WORK.

Henry Pathe Lehrman, producing comedies for the Universal program at the Pacific Coast studios of the Universal on July 27. He will fill the position of supervising director for three comedy companies, the products of which will be released under the brand-name "L. K. O.," meaning "Lehrman Company." Abraham Sterns, brother of Julius Sterns, who has had considerable experience in the business end of motion picture manufacture, has been chosen as Mr. Lehrman's business manager.

Mr. Lehrman took with him from New York three actors who will play the leading roles in his first company. They are Billie Ritchie, English comedian; Henry Bergman, well-known character man, and Gertrude Selby, famous as a vaudeville artist.

Mrs. Boissevain's Talks on Pictures

The Young Lawyer-Suffragette Declares the Screen Needs Real Drama—Favors Shakespearean Productions.

By Florence Margolies.

ISN'T it fair to suppose that the very mention of suffragette, lawyer and orator when applied to a woman conjures up a blue-stockinged vision, bespectacled and garbed in rainy-day skirt and hair drawn tightly back? Well, Inez Millholland Boissevain is not only a suffragette but a suffragette-general, and on horseback when in parade. As a lawyer, she is keen and discerning, and can sum up a case to the satisfaction of the sternest jury; as an orator she is eloquent and convincing. But does your conjured vision of her concur with the fair reality? Not by the longest shot. She is young, with eyes and face aglow, and a smile that positively irradiates her law office; dressed exquisitely and possessed of a grace that charms—that's Inez Millholland to the eye.

Ensconced in one of her client's chairs, I felt by that little look she wafted at me that it was time to propound the question: "What is your attitude toward the motion picture movement?" She anticipated me by saying in her inimitably firm and decisive manner: "You know I really never talk of anything but suffrage and law, but I am so very much interested in the 'movies' that I am glad of this opportunity to talk about them.

"As an educational factor," she continued earnestly, "they are of incalculable importance. They are a mighty conserver of time and energy, and are so forcible a medium of reaching the mind. That the memory retains best and longest that which it has acquired through the sense of sight has long since been scientifically proven. Now then, just think"—this with one of Inez Millholland's characteristic gestures—"Just think with what wonderful results history, geography, biology, physics, chemistry and even economics can be taught by the aid of motion pictures. Do you know that one afternoon's reel lecture in evolution is about the equivalent of six weeks' study at college?"

To my objection that the exhibitor would hardly find these bills box office attractions, Mrs. Boissevain flashed back at me: "You mark my word that a series of motion picture lectures on any of the mentioned subjects would pack houses much more densely than any of the clap-trap of today in which the heroine has the nine lives of the proverbial cat. If exhibitors would only realize the one great incontrovertible truth that the masses respond most freely to what is best and biggest and loftiest, that is, to fidelity in presentation of life, for that is what they understand, their success would be assured. Such understanding means knowledge; knowledge means self-preservation. What we mean by good is that which is good for race development. It is this mass instinct for the best that is responsible for progress and evolution, else, you know, we still would be swinging from the trees." At this point, I suggested the censor, only to be met with a very emphatic statement.

"Censorship is an impertinence. It amounts to this; that a few appointed or rather self-appointed individuals choose and select and pass on the style and nature of my amusement. It is nothing less than a dictatorship that every sense of democracy revolts against, and it is undeniably a most hazardous check on progress. Why, let the people saturate themselves in all the rankest stuff that the screen can portray, if they want to; that's all right, for they will rapidly get sick of what is bad and untrue and clamor for what is good. Take care to set up alongside of what is bad all that you can in the way of beauty and truth and fidelity to life. No, it is not a dangerous experiment, because it is contrary to all truth when it is said that evil can be perpetuated. Some people may demand and enjoy the salacious more than others, but you just continually set up against the vulgar the aesthetic, and there is little danger of the former winning out. For the latter spells life and the former destruction, and preservation of life is most fundamental of all impulses.

"What an unlimited range of possibilities and what enormous potentialities does this great modern development, the motion picture, possess! It occurs to me what a splendid medium it is for breaking down race barriers, for instance, and for the production of vast humanizing influence. The magic camera can be brought into play in any and every obscurest corner of the earth and reproduce the various humans as they live and are. And when they appear on the screen before our eyes we are certain to find that in the last analysis we are all alike—and a bond of inter-human fellowship is at once effected."

Mrs. Inez Milholland Boissevain.

From her deeply reflective and philosophic mood this delightfully feminine oracle suddenly and without decent notice turned a pair of great luminous eyes full upon me and ejaculated: "Why in the name of common sense don't those bright business men, the exhibitors, demand and get real drama for their screens? Why don't they unite and through concerted action break away from the everlasting sameness of theme? I am intensely interested in pictures, and I go anywhere and everywhere they are shown, searching for what, I am convinced, can be beautifully done, yet invariably I find artificial clap-trap and absolutely meaningless tommyrot. Always, I know what is going to happen. Everything depends upon the merest mechanical incident. Someone's hat is turned awry by a brisk wind, and, voilà, a dénouement. Now you understand that that is not real life, and it is imperative that it disappears from reel life.

"With the truly marvelous development of kinematography, it is now altogether possible to transmit the entire range of human emotion. True, the voice is missing, but what of bodily gestures and facial expression? What can be more absorbingly interesting than to see a great, passionate struggle within truly depicted on the face? Of course, I don't mean those ridiculous contortions that are hurled from the screen, as it were, upon an unoffending audience. It is the greatest mistake to misjudge the public by asking them to enjoy such careless stuff. Give them the real and they will respond with alacrity. Make overtures to the man and woman on the street and you will go right every time. What they want is what is really wanted. Study their tastes and your theaters will be stormed for admittance. For, you know, the man in the street will not put up with second best.

"I admit very readily the legitimacy of the thrill, but you need not necessarily go up in a balloon, or blow up a bridge, or throw on the screen a squad of police and firemen in order to produce the thrill. Not at all. It is far easier and more subtle and more satisfactory to produce it through a fair and true interpretation of heart-matters and the conflict of wills and ideas. No, not those sob-stories.

"You asked me what I would do, or what policy I would pursue were I a motion picture manufacturer. Well, I would do Shakespeare. I would have his works filmized and thereby furnish untold delight to an immense public. In everything I would put on the screen, I would insist upon scrupulous accuracy of interpretation and detail and I would try to steer clear of anachronisms in events and costumes and of bad and inappropriate music."

Doings at Los Angeles

GEORGE LARKIN, playing the lead with Cleo Madison under the direction of Wilfred Lucas in "The Trey o' Hearts," writes a letter from the San Diego hotel, saying that the company doing so many sea pictures for this big film is well and happy, and making some good pictures. George says in part, "Have been here two weeks and expect to be here another. Are making many scenes on board yacht, schooner, motorboat, etc., for the third, fourth and fifth installments of this series. Outside of thirty-foot falls down the sides of cliffs, forty-foot backfalls into water, a few drowning scenes, swimming rapids, jumping from boats, and other stunts, I have nothing to do 'till tomorrow,' as they say." George says he received a fine bull terrier from an admirer down there, a wealthy dog fancier who trailed the company while the pictures were being made. The players are to return next week.

Raymond B. West, ex-cameraman, former technical worker, and all around studio expert, who has been directing for some time a long list of good plays for Thomas H. Ince's western outfit, has done a good one which received much credit when developed. It is "The Right to Die," a strong and interesting drama of how a man wishes to kill himself, but seeing his ghost, desists, and then does. In this production West directs, puts the punch in the heavy scenes, and turns the crank part of the time.

James M. Tally, a moving picture magnate well known in this city has recently opened to the public a new theater known as The Palace of Pictures, which is one of the best playhouses on Broadway. The cost of the house was $18,000, it being a Class "A" building, with a seating capacity of 450, and is equipped with a cold-air ventilating system. The house runs only multiple-reel features which are first run in the city. The lobby is a feature of the theater, being finished in elegant style with plenty of illumination.

Cecil De Mille is doing great things with the old Lasky studio. The stage has been enlarged to 60 by 200 feet, and two tiers of dressing rooms have been added. Many other improvements are being made, including a series of paint coats everywhere.

The third issue of Script is off the press and the Authors seem to be striding well toward a certain point. Anyway, the little booklet has been found quite welcome in most every studio and home. Many non-members are inquiring where Script can be bought. It is sent to members only. Photoplaywrights should apply to the secretary, 604 San Fernando building, this city, care of the Photoplay Authors' League.

Francis Ford and Grace Cunard, who worked so hard with the big series and who went on their vacations to the east, have returned and are glad to be back in the southland. They will resume work soon at the same old stand.

"Pathe" is back. H. Pathe Lehrman, formerly director for Keystone, and later for Stering, has organized a company of players who will work at the Universal studios, releasing through the same program. "Pathe" intends doing feature comedies of merit.

L. Frank Baum, president of the Oz Company, has installed a complete plant for making costumes, as the wearing apparel for Oz films is so unique and quaint that no local costumer keeps anything like what is used in these films. Work is going on here at a lively pace, and already the first big picture is out of the laboratory and in the projection room, making quite an impression on the people who saw it completely run.

Ruth Roland and Marshall Nielan have done six 1,000-foot comedies in three weeks, which is just double what they usually do. The little company returned from a trip to Santa Barbara, where a Roman comedy was made in the costly and beautiful gardens of one of the millionaires of that city. The film is a wonder, some of the most beautiful phoptography marking it as a feature, regardless of the script, and even that is a winner.

Robert Thornby is putting on a funny film with Billy which is entitled "Lost in a Studio," being a day of Billy's life. He gets lost; locked up in the film vault, and a frantic search is made. Finally the little chap is discovered in the dark box of steel and concrete. The film is a corker.

Frank Montgomery and five automobile loads of players went to the famous Bear valley to do a real Western this week. It is a surprise to hear that "Monty" is doing something other than Indian. The big truck was one of the naptha wagons which was overloaded with grub and shelter.

D. A. Lithicum, H. E. Roach and I. N. Nance are at the head of the Rolin Film Company, which was last week incorporated for $10,000. There are so many film companies being launched that it is a hard matter to run them down and get details. It is not known whether this firm is to produce, sell, or buy.

William D. Taylor is with the Balboa, and not the Vitagraph, as many people who have seen "Captain Alvarez" naturally think. The big man from the land of Erin is busy directing at the Long Beach plant, and is doing fine work. E. D. Horkheimer says that the company expects to really double its working force, output, and plant inside of a year.

An election was held on the 28th at Santa Monica, and it was a sight to see the campaign, men come for the Vitagraph players in automobiles and take them to the polls with their make-ups on. Some people not familiar with the little moving picture city thought that a "movie" election scene was being put on and watched the proceedings for nearly an hour, thinking that more "colored" people would appear to vote. The colony here are all voters, and the women folks take great pleasure in casting their vote.

G. O. Post and E. Powell, two city correspondents of Pathe's Weekly, took several hundred feet of the balloon race which started at the beach in Venice. They secured some good film, which was shipped east immediately.

The Educational Film Company has leased the entire tenth floor and roof of the Knickerbocker Building on Olive street, near Seventh, for ten years at an approximate rental of $50,000. The building will be transformed into an up-to-date moving picture producing studio. This company is said, by local people, to be the first of its kind in this country.

"Tammany Young" is on the fifth of the "Bill" series of office boy adventures. He organizes the other boys into a union and leads them in a strike for a raise. This one is quite amusing.

The Photoplayers are almost reorganizing the club, which has sort of lost its charm for the many film folks here, and the officers are striving to make the place what it used to be. Lately the dinner nights attendances have lessened and the managers are worried. They are planning a series of interesting events, hoping that in bringing the members closer together club life will again prevail. The slump in interest was caused partially by summer, which has taken many members off to the resorts and beaches, where athletics, surf baths, fishing, and many other pastimes offer more pleasure than in the hot city at the club. Fred Mace, president, will probably be replaced, as he is in Europe, and his return will not be made for some time.

H. B. Warner is on his way to the east with "The Ghost Breaker" in his vault-trunk. Max Figman leaves in another week with "What's His Name." "Where the Trail Divides," featuring Robert Edeson, is already half finished and the star will depart soon with his precious film. Edward Abeles will arrive soon to play a return engagement with the Lasky company, being featured in "Bobby Burnitt." Soon "Ready Money" will be drawn on for this notable actor, after he has gone through with the other million.

CLARKE IRVINE.

CATHOLICS TO HAVE CENSOR BOARD.

A well-defined movement is on foot for the establishment of a Catholic board of censors composed of fifty eminent priests, who will pass upon all motion pictures intended to be shown in the churches of the parishes in America. The movement has the sanction of Right Reverend Monsignor Michael J. Lavelle, Vicar General, and will be used to censor the new Catholic moving pictures issued every six weeks by the Emerson-Currier Cinematograph Corporation featuring Mabel Emerson, and known as the "Animated Catholic Magazine."

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

IT is painful to hear remarks made by some magnates (?) in filmdom centers upon the effect the European war will have on the motion picture business. The sensationalists are hysterical in their prophecies as to the growth of business the exhibition of war pictures will bring to distributors and exhibitors in this country. Their warped mentality sees nothing but dollars and cents. But little trace of sentiment is shown regarding the devastation and misery the war will bring. To them, perhaps, the greatest and most horrible war the world has ever known appeals solely as a cold-blooded business proposition—an opportunity for gain by those outside the calamity zone.

Enthusiasts of this character are doomed to receive a surprising jolt that will not only bring their senses back to a normal degree but also teach them that the public will not allow its intelligence to be challenged by reckless and unreliable portrayals of incidents attending the lamentable situation in Europe. Such promoters, it may be reasonably expected, will put upon the market war stuff that will be such in name only, and the exhibitors of the country are warned against them. Such exploits will injure the business. Momentarily sensational advertising will bring big box-office receipts and at the same time so disgust the patrons as to injure the efforts of legitimate producers and exhibitors to give the people authentic reproduction of incidents attending the great war. Exhibitors who wish to continue in the business and have any respect for the intelligence and sentiments of their patrons will spare nothing in determining whether or not war subjects that may be offered them have any real merit, and not allow themselves to be carried away by sensational printed matter and the importunities of over-zealous and dollar-seeking manufacturers and agents.

Some of the so-called magnates lay great stress upon the fact that thousands of dollars were brought to the coffers of the theaters by the exhibition of motion pictures touching upon incidents attending the Spanish-American War. The conditions of that time and those existing today were vastly different. At the time of the war, motion pictures appealed to the public only as a novelty. The only authentic pictures exhibited then showed preparations for the departure of armies and navies, soldiers in camp and war vessels at their moorings and sailing up and down rivers and bays. The motion picture business had not sufficiently developed to enable the taking of real actions on land, or sea; pictures purporting to show such actions were fakes which had as an excuse for their exploitation shrewdly worded announcements, such as, "A reproduction of incidents reported from Manila Bay." The better educated class of people could not feel offended. The less fortunate patrons, when they learned that the pictures which they believed were representations of real incidents brought to them by a wonderful science, became so unfavorably impressed that for several years after it was difficult to convince them that bona fide subjects were actual reproductions of incidents snapped by the camera upon the scene of action. It was the latter class of people that formed the nucleus for the immense patronage motion pictures now enjoy, but that patronage was not forthcoming until after years of endeavor made by legitimate producers to remove impressions made by the crude and fake productions.

Today the motion picture form of entertainment is entirely free from the old-time atmosphere of novelty. The people no longer marvel over the means by which reproductions upon the screen are accomplished. Even the youngest of the patrons, by reading and study, have become so familiar with the motion picture art that they can tell almost to a nicety how pictures are taken and reproduced, and can detect fakes in an instant. They know that the motion picture camera in the course of development in the picture business has taken its place side by side with the printing press, and it is now possible for the film manufacturers to give them authentic scenes of action in all parts of the world, whether it be a battle on sea or land, a society function, a great hunt, or any other incident that goes to help fill the news columns of the press. All this means that whatever, or whoever, pretends to give the people authentic representations of incidents attending the great impending war must be on the level, and any exhibitor who aids those things and people that are not so may as well go out of business before the war gets started.

There is another thing to be considered: Diplomacy must be exercised in the presentation of subjects, no matter how authentic and truthful they may be. There must be no imaginary standard of perfection, no blind effort to catch the rabble and gale of popular favor. The population of this country is distinct in itself. No other country on the globe has as great a number of varied nationalities, creeds and sects in touch with each other, and purveyors of amusements cater to all of them; so that to be successful and hold the patronage, the managers must endeavor to get as near as possible to the point of pleasing everybody and offending none. To this end exaggerated situations must be omitted and vivid views for conditions touching upon the horrors and miseries of war must also be avoided. In this respect the motion pictures must rise above the standard of the daily press and become its superior in the dissemination of war news. The press has a means of escape which motion pictures do not enjoy. Thousands of people read with avidity descriptions of devastation of lives and property at scenes of battle. An equal, if not superior, number, take warning from the headlines and pass over such accounts. Their sensitiveness and sympathies will not permit them to read them. Thus the newspapers escape offending people of this character. With motion pictures it is different. In a flash the situations are portrayed upon the screen, and the effect is planted before the class of people spoken of can avoid it. If the effect is made there is but one alternative for the offended ones, and that is to ignore picture houses that exhibit war pictures. This patronage the exhibitors cannot afford to lose, because it cuts the business to an extent that materially affects the gross.

Of course, it is a difficult matter for a producer or exhibitor to determine exactly the character of pictures that will not offend some of the patrons to some degree. That cannot be expected. What can be done is reflected by a very opportune comment in a current issue of a leading newspaper, which stated that there still remains a chance that somebody who will mobilize the common sense of the powers involved in the impending war. That is the keynote that should prompt the motion picture people. The zeal of those at the scene of action must be scrutinized. The mere fact that a film truthfully represents some scene before, during or after a battle does not justify its reproduction upon the screen. It is noted that already one company is busy heralding forthcoming war productions and refers to the Austrian legions pressing over the bodies of their own and the fallen of the Serb defenders. There is a phrase in current parlance which, although more forcible than elegant, conveys the exact idea—"have a heart." It is recalled that at the time of the last great earthquake in Italy motion picture views were taken of the devastation. Copies brought to this country drew immense audiences to the places of exhibition, but it was soon found necessary to cut out some of the scenes because they were so ghastly that both patrons and press admonished the exhibitors to make the changes.

There is one thing the enthusiastic war picture agents and exhibitors apparently overlook, and that is the interest of the manufacturers. All now engaged in the manufacture of subjects cannot divert their whole attention to the war. The market would be glutted. Companies producing on the other side will not be able to complacently continue the operations of the past with a state of war all about them. American manufacturers, it is feared, will be hit hard by the same conditions, and, after all, the war will not prove the boon to the motion picture business that some short-sighted people seem to think it will be. Although this country has thus far fortunately escaped connection with the unfortunate condition of affairs on the other side and will profit by immense exports of foodstuffs and other articles, a conservative view of the situation does not present an assuring condition for the motion picture business. It has been stated that in war times places of amusement are the last to close, that the excited and nerve-strung populaces seek them as a means for diverting the mind; and the motion picture houses will be the last to feel the effects of the European war. This is true, but the manufacturing end of the motion picture business on the other side cannot be expected to enjoy more tranquility and stability in a state of war than other industries, and exportations of motion pictures from this side will suffer from money stringencies before the exportations of necessaries of life. The foreign trade of American motion picture manufacturers is tremendous, and it is bound to feel unfavorable effects of the war.

Foreign Trade Notes

BRITISH NOTES.

PRIVATE exhibitors of notable films for the benefit, obviously of trade buyers, sometimes develop into miniature social functions and some of our leading firms might almost be suspected of competing with each other for the distinction of treating film-reviewers most liberally. But it cannot be argued that this mild form of inducement to visit one particular trade show is alone peculiar to the moving picture industry, it exists in every department of commerce where two parties meet for buying and selling, yet there is a limit—or at least should be—to everything and at a Sunday review in the North where intoxicants "ad lib" were provided for the "refreshment" of the reviewers its necessity was all the more evident. I think a good idea economically and otherwise, would be for manufacturers and renters to combine for the purpose of acquiring a large central building which would permit of six different exhibitions being given simultaneously. The largest theatre could be reserved solely for the exhibition of features, the second for dramas, the third for comedies and so on. The various manufacturing or renting firms might be charged fixed rates to have their films exhibited. From the reviewers' point of view some such organized mode of exhibiting releases would greatly facilitate their task.

Mr. Benito Nicholls, the manager of the Moving Picture Sales Agency has returned to London from a visit to the United States.

As a purely democratic institution the moving-picture theater is no more. Society has succumbed to its charms and now that the London season is terminating there appears to be a great vogue for moving picture exhibitions at country house parties. A London firm of projector dealers claim to have under execution sixteen orders from notabilities to fit up modern installations at their private houses. In a few cases it is stated that feature films have been booked by these aristocratic amateur exhibitors upon release dates.

The recent revival in the art of boxing in England excited the public appetite for pictures of the recent Carpentier-Smith contest. Two years ago films of this type were severely criticised and often prohibited, but so far the Carpentier-Smith pictures have gone unharrassed. To say they were taken under difficult conditions by artificial light the photography is extraordinarily good.

J. B. SUTCLIFFE.

From Another Correspondent.

Moving picture films in which are depicted snow scenes are in great demand in the cinema houses of London and vicinity. The warm weather in London is having its effect on the picture palaces, but the slump is believed to be only temporary, inasmuch as there are many people looking for sites for picture houses. Fowler Pettie, chairman of the Exhibitors' Association, says cinema houses that go into receivers' hands are much sought after just now. He says the houses are a "boom." Last year, it is said, nearly $10,000,000 was invested in the cinema business in this country, bringing the total to over $75,000,000. Mr. Pettie says: "I can see no end to it unless another form of entertainment equally popular and cheaper is invented."

Lurid drama with a moral kick—several moral kicks, in fact—is the type of film East London desires. The East End, that quarter in which London's poor huddle and fight for the grimy copper that will admit them to the pictures, is as particular about its subjects as about its melodrama. The Daily Chronicle publishes a typical bill from an East End house and a West End house, the latter being the "highbrow" quarter, as follows:

West End—Comics, 3; drama (refined) 1; historical, 1; Scenic, 1.

West End—Comics, 2; big sensation, 1; drama, 2.

The East End wants nothing on the "mollycoddle" order. The rest of London may have its pastoral and Shakespearean productions.

During the year ended March 31, 1914, the net profit of cinema houses in London derived from Sunday shows was about $163,225, according to a report just submitted to the London County Council. By regulation the profits from all Sunday cinema shows go to charitable institutions and societies. The report shows that the total gross receipts from Sunday moving picture theaters in licensed premises during the year was nearly $850,000.

George Robey, probably the leading music hall comedian of the United Kingdom, has been photographed by the Burns Film Company, and will soon appear on the screen here trying to hide an anarchistic bomb in his soup. The popular comedian is to the 'alls what Sir Herbert Tree is to the stage. His debut only demonstrates the close ties between the moving picture business and the regular theatrical profession here.

OLCOTT PLAYERS ATTRACT TOURISTS.

They do say that the town of Killarney in Ireland really lives off the tourist, but you certainly must give them credit for being quick to see new ways of getting the money.

The Sid Olcott International Players had hardly started on their season's work near the famous Gap of Dunloe, just outside of Killarney, this year before requests poured in from all the Killarney tourist hotels for post cards and any other literature which might be distributed among the incoming tourists, of whom about two hundred arrive each day.

The hotel men promptly distributed these cards and the result has been that every party which starts for the Gap and the Lakes stops at the Olcott studio for a few hours, it being on the main road.

The tourists are very eager for information as to how the big feature pictures are made and they literally swarm about the studio when the company is working on the stage, with the mountains and lakes in the background, or when they are out on one of the roadways.

The hotel men who have been so quick to see this opportunity get their returns through the fact that now almost every tourist who comes to Killarney stays one day longer than before Mr. Olcott came, some in fact staying over two and three days to see some unusually big scenes in features that they have taken a particular interest in.

Mr. Olcott is also being blessed by the natives this year for the fact that he has brought rain. There had been a little dry spell before he came but there has been a shower of some duration every day since his arrival, with several very good storms. It has been a case of sneaking out for exteriors every time the sun showed his face. Mr. Olcott's visit has certainly helped the Killarney neighborhood this year.

RAY FILM COMPANY—NEW ORGANIZATION.

A new film company, headed by an old moving picture man, has recently begun operations upon an extensive scale. The Ray Film Company, Inc., whose president is Clarence F. Ray, for many years connected with many of the various film companies in executive capacities, is now in the field for industrial work, having recently secured the contract for the Panama-Pacific Exposition motion pictures for the State of West Virginia. This contract will involve the taking of between 16,000 and 20,000 feet of the beauties, industries, etc., of the scenic grandeur of the State of West Virginia. Although many of the largest companies in the business were opposing competitors, the award was made to the Ray Film Company, Inc., and the officers of that company feel pride in that fact.

Wm. J. Schoonmaker, vice-president; George H. Borst, secretary, and Frank T. Reeve, treasurer, complete the roster of the officers of this enterprising corporation. The company's offices are located conveniently at 326 Fifth avenue, New York City.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Well, How Can He.

THIS letter is not from an exhibitor, but from one of our photoplay writing friends. It supplies its own comment. This writer has made no study of house managements and feels no particular interest in their conduct, but he shows what an outsider thinks of the way some houses are run. It comes from a Massachusetts town:

> Can you beat this?
> Dropped into the REEL, a little house on Main street in town here. The admission was a five cent piece. Tried to offer my ticket to the doorkeeper, but he would not take it, so passed on in and took a seat. The picture on was "Two Up a Tree," Pathe, released Dec. 24. There was a very slim house, and I sat through a series of pictures all as old, and most of them so far out of date that my file does not give them. Between two of the reels the operator, a union man by the way, flashed a crudely written sign on the screen to the effect that ELEVEN reels were shown daily at the house, a Warner feature, two two-reel licensed and four single-reel licensed pictures. Then came a slide to the effect that the management would give away tomorrow a carnation, "the best that money could buy," to every patron. This was followed by, "Look on the back of your tickets. They are good any day between 11 a. m. and 1.30 p. m. or between 4 and 6.30 p. m."
> Down in a little town in Florida there is a real estate dealer by the name of Kenney. He has signboards strewn about the country in the neighborhood of this town which read, "There is a real estate dealer in ———— that undersells any other dealer." (Then in big letters), "How KENNEY do it?"
> I steal this phrase to question the business methods of the management of the REEL—How KENNEY do it?

Hurray!

Harold Ballou, of the Olympian, Seattle, has a lot of quiet fun in his mimeograph News Letter. A recent paragraph runs:

> Some time ago in order to show our willingness to run our playhouse any way the greatest number wanted it run, we offered to go into the lottery business and stay in it until pinched by the authorities, but nobody enthused about it.

We wonder how many others really did go in and find that too few enthused about it to make the idea profitable. Most persons are clever enough to prefer a good show to a cheap lottery with a couple of small prizes.

All Caps.

The Shawmut theater, Boston, sends in a card announcing the publication of "The Million Dollar Mystery" in the Boston Globe and the showing of the film in their house. It is set almost entirely in capitals and we think that most persons looked at the solid type and threw the card away. It is not easy to read twenty-eight lines in solid twelve-point capitals. It strains the eye. Counting the entire advertisement there are forty-three lines, but one of which is in lower case. The main point of an advertisement is to get it read and this is not possible in an announcement with the monotonous capital letters. A card for "Caprice" is much better done because it carries less reading and plenty of cut. The Shawmut has done some capital advertising, notably their first souvenir book of the house, but it seems to leave too much to the printer, or else the advertising man worships strange gods.

Keeping Up with Cupid.

R. P. Greer, of the Theatorium, Uniontown, Ala., writes that the town has been flooded with invitations to June weddings lately and so he got out an advertisement in invitation form. The outer form is addressed in typewriter type,

TO YOU,
CITY.

This is not as good as would have been a personal address, but perhaps these were also used. The invitation reads.

YOU ARE CORDIALLY INVITED TO SEE
WASHINGTON AT VALLEY FORGE
FRIDAY EVENING
JUNE NINETEENTH, NINETEEN FOURTEEN
AT 8 AND 9 P. M.

THEATORIUM
10 AND 20c

R. S. V. P.
BY COMING

The smaller card that is customary reads: "Bring some one with you."

This is a good idea about once a year and the time of weddings is the best time for its use, but if printers down in Alabama still cling to Old English type, they should be educated to some of the more modern and more easily read faces. The main point is that the advertisement follows the fashions and so is timely, which is the great thing.

Perhaps Boy Scouts.

The Rex Theater, Hopkinsville, Ky., sends in a picture of the house with a troop of Boy Scouts, but no letter explains the stunt that was tried in connection with "Soldiers of Fortune," though perhaps the Scouts were invited to attend the performance in a body. With the photograph comes several copies of the "Rextra." The first issue was a six-by-eight, four-pager on white paper. Later it turned into a four-pager on stiff cover paper and then it began to take up white inside pages. The advertising is not permitted to overrun the house stuff, except that there is a double middle page given some local concern. The good positions, with this exception, go to the house matter, which is one reason why they can get double-page advertisements.

One funny break states as "Our Policy" the fact that the management is "unutterably opposed to the exhibition in their theater of pictures of the sensational type" and on the next page in heavier type is announced "One of the most sensational pictures ever thrown on the screen will be 'The Battle of the Sexes'." In connection with the announcement of policy, the billing is unfortunate, no matter what the film itself may be.

Some of the other matter is more useful and is passed along to others.

The Movies and the Public.

Many people are interested in moving pictures. The business has advanced until it is past the experimental stage. Not only that; it is past the stage where the possessor of a few seats, a cheap machine and a worn-out film service can cater successfully to your pleasure.

I want you to get my idea of a first-class picture show; what the aim of the management is and why we have adopted the policy we have.

A man grew famous over night by giving his book the title "Pigs Is Pigs." I make my bid for notoriety by saying "Films is not Films—Always." Recently I saw films advertised for $3 per reel.

Not for rent, but for sale, at that price. Think of it; less than half the price we pay for rent for one day's use. I can furnish you with six reels for the same price you now pay for four. I can furnish you ten at no greater cost to myself than I now pay for four.

Do you want quantity at a sacrifice of quality?

I hope not, for you will be disappointed when you attend the REX.

If you know of any way by which we can improve the REX, any way by which we can add to your comfort and enjoyment, I certainly will appreciate your telling me about it. I am always on the lookout for something that will make your visits more enjoyable. One thing is certain; it is you that I am trying to please, and if you don't tell me when I do and do not please you, how am I to know?

We run our exhaust fans during the night so as to carry the cool night air through the house, and by the time morning comes we have the house cool and sweet. This insures the theater being nice and cool all afternoon.

Is It Fair?

Is it fair to allow one man to work on Sunday and make another not work? Is it fair to allow one man to operate his business on Sunday and not permit another to do so? Is it fair to allow an outsider to come into Hopkinsville and give a Sunday afternoon entertainment and not permit a home institution to do so? Is there any difference between an entertainment given by the Chautauqua on Sunday afternoon for pay than that offered by the picture shows on the same day? Answer these questions for me. Is it fair? Is it consistent?

The Open Sunday.

The question is put squarely up to the ministers and the public in general regarding the Sunday opening. The coming Chautauqua intends giving an entertainment on Sunday and charging admission.

Last year's program will give the people some idea of what to expect. It is nothing more or less than a vaudeville performance. The people who take part in it are not good enough to grace the vaudeville stage. If they were, you can bet your bottom dollar they would not be traveling around with a tent show. The Chautauqua has grown away from the element that gave it its start. Originally it was a movement of the churches to supply good clean entertainment to the smaller towns and was a source of good. It is getting to be more of a commercial affair every day, fewer men reaping the profits from the enterprise. We have no kick coming on the class of entertainment offered. It is, as a rule, splendid. But I put the question to you in all fairmindedness, WILL YOU PERMIT AN OUTSIDE ENTERPRISE TO COME TO THIS CITY AND GIVE A SUNDAY PERFORMANCE AND CHARGE ADMISSION, AND NOT LET THE HOME MERCHANT STAY OPEN ON SUNDAY FOR THE SAME REASON? The Rex has no desire to open on Sunday, but we are in favor of closing up everything that is operated for profit on this day or open up everything that is not of a demoralizing nature. We do claim that if our show is a source of good during the week, that it is as much good, if not better, on Sunday. WHAT ARE YOU GOING TO DO ABOUT IT?

ARE YOU AFRAID TO DECLARE WHERE YOU STAND? I'M NOT.

Undoubtedly the Chautauqua is becoming more and more of a sideshow affair with everything from Secretary of State to trained dogs as the attractions, and the shot is timely. Stuff like that puts ginger into the program and makes it read. Sometimes you can advertise your house best by talking about something else, if you can talk intelligently and interestingly.

Certainly Not.

George E. Carpenter, of the Real Reels, issued by the Notable Feature Film Company of Salt Lake City, wants to know if we think that his publication is a wasted effort. We certainly think nothing of the sort. We have already quoted from the publication and expect to use a lot more, for it is straight from the shoulder educational stuff that helps the manager help himself by hustling. It tells him how to hustle and urges the need of it. Here is some more gingery advice. It is something that even the small town exhibtor must come to.

We appreciate the fact that the daily change of program has many advocates. Some call it progressive; others aver that their town is too small and a daily change is imperative.

Be that as it may, there are indications in our office that the average exhibitor throughout this intermountain region is taking a tumble to himself. During the past two weeks we have had a number of orders to make bookings for two or more consecutive days as against one day only, heretofore in vogue in the smaller towns.

The average exhibitor realizes that in order to get business he must advertise. He also realizes that on a daily change his advertising is of little benefit. Where he can run a subject two or three days, his paper, newspaper advertisements and above all, the word of mouth advertising done voluntarily by his pleased patrons are a great investment. He pays express charges in and out on his films, and this seven days in the week is quite an item. The money he spends in this and seven different sets of paper, slides and cuts, mounts up each month in surprising fashion.

For less money he can wage a strenuous advertising campaign on something really worth while and deliver the goods. And his patrons will come again and bring a friend.

Most exchange house organs are merely catalogues. This is a newspaper. Of course it helps the exchange if the films are kept longer, but it helps the managers more. Take the matter of paper alone. You might be able to use ten sheets where you can afford but five a day. Get ten and keep the film two days and you get more than double the effect.

But this is merely a small matter. Take the big view. It now and then happens that a good dramatic performance comes into New York and is jumped on by all the critics, though it pleases the public. If the manager has the nerve to stick on, he can win out almost entirely through the advertisement by word of mouth of the persons who have seen the show. It goes in ever widening circles until the whole town knows it is a good entertainment. In the same way the Monday night crowd is the best possible advertisement for the Tuesday night performance, if the Tuesday program is the same as Monday's.

Mr. Arnold Has Moved.

S. A. Arnold, of Mena, Ark., has gone on to Stuttgart, in the same state, and is running the Airdome there. The house has been giving vaudeville and has not been run properly in any department. Right after Mr. Arnold took hold the knell of vaudeville was sounded in this wise:

MORTUARY.

Just plain oderiferious, that's what the

was at the Airdome last night, like a boy who played truant, trying to make a good excuse to save himself from punishment, that's what I am trying to do this morning—honest. The only excuse I can offer is, "I won't do it again if you let me off this time."

The act Monday night is closed; they nor any other will never appear at the Airdome under the present management.

But starting tonight and every Tuesday we will present a Pathe Weekly of Current Events. Tonight's Weekly will show American Troops landing at Vera Cruz, American Aeroplane Scouting, Effect of United States Bombardment, Fighting in the Streets of Vera Cruz—and other live topics.

His next stunt was a telegram by "Western Onion" regularly addressed and delivered by uniformed telegraph boys, being signed for in the usual fashion. It was addressed inside to "Mr. and Mrs. Yourself" and advised the recipient to be at the Airdome that night to see "The Perils of Pauline." Mr. Arnold writes that the scheme worked excellently.

Another stunt is a small book about two inches square, eight pages. On the cover is printed:

A FULL LIST OF ALL PICTURE SHOWS
BETTER THAN THE
AIRDOME.

The other pages are blank. It is merely a changed treatment of an old idea, but it works about every so often. Mr. Arnold suggests that it would be a more permanent advertisement if the inside pages were waxed that they might be used for keeping stamps in. It might pay some novelty house to get these up in quantity for home printing. If someone does Mr. Arnold should be entitled to a complimentary lot.

We are glad to see Mr. Arnold back in harness. Some day we want to see him at the head of a circuit. It is not only in advertising that he shows he knows his business.

Doing Their Best.

If, in this picture of the Besse Theater, South Omaha, Neb., there seems to be a preponderance of Col. Cody's picture, remember that these one-sheets, a legacy from the old "Bill show," was all the paper that could be had. The six-sheet is for Biograph's "The Battle of Elderbush Gulch." The Besse seats 680, and, although a five-cent house, it ran for three days at a quarter.

Col. Cody is well known in Omaha, for his ranch is not far from there, but at that it takes nerve to take an eight-reel subject into a five-cent house at a quarter price, or perhaps "inelligence" is a better word than nerve. It takes more intelligence than nerve to see that a big feature will do better a third day than a first, but G. L. Atkins could see it.

Matters of Size.

C. G. Haney, of the Star theater, Hampton, Iowa, thinks his seven by nine program too large but explains that the printer preferred that size. As the sheet is folded once it makes a handy size and one that is neither too large nor too small. The program is merely the titles and a brief underline, but the work is well displayed, and is clean and readable. Later on we hope that Mr. Haney will work over to some reading matter apart from the program, but this is a good starter and he avoids the mistakes that many have made. The principal use of a program is to get its facts over to the reader in comprehensive fashion.

One line we do not like. It runs: "We never change our prices. They are always five and ten cents." There is no reason why this should be so. Many houses are outgrowing the ten cent limit. Get ready for it now with an occasional fifteen cent feature and the quarter price for features that are worth that much will come in time.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Compact, Complete and Comprehensive.

VERY lately we examined the work of a correspondent. She wrote a most entertaining letter, displayed more than average intelligence in a general discussion of photoplay matters, and in every way seemed to be one of those who were standing on the threshold waiting to advance to success, and so we studied one of her scripts and we were shocked. It was loose in construction, rambling, awkward and about everything else we could mention. She had had sample scripts, books, personal advice and all the rest, and still she was not able even to give her script the knowing look, let alone a professional development.

Were she the exception this would be of no consequence, but she is eminently typical of fully half the writers whose scripts we have seen. She has not the first idea of what to do or how to do it, and she doesn't seem to be able to catch the idea.

If you were told to draw a straight line from A to B, the chances are that you could do it. Then if you get a copy of a script or copies of several scripts, why don't you go from A to B in a straight line instead of something that looks like a spiral after a three day's drunk?

You are told to move from one scene to the scene that advances the next part of the plot. But you go to the third next development and have to vision back to get in the forgotten matter. Some of you never do get it in. If you cannot read and understand it is useless to try and do anything. If you study you can understand, but if you want to act like a heaven-born genius and rise superior to study, you will only land in a place that is about as remote from heaven as can well be imagined.

Some years ago there used to be a little group of theatrical men who each noon occupied a certain table in a well known New York restaurant. One of them had a little trick done with two toothpicks and some skill. It was so seemingly simple that it was irritating when it could not be at once caught, and it was a sort of initiation at the table that newcomers were coaxed to essay the trick and the initiates sat around and did the trick in concert. Sometimes the newcomer would get sore and quit. Some would catch it almost at once. It took us about seven weeks.

Now writing plays is precisely like getting that toothpick trick. It is simple once you know it. Some people get the trick offhand and others take weeks or months, but every man who has two hands can learn the toothpick trick and every man and woman who has a brain and imagination can, with practice, learn to write scripts. The point is to keep on practicing, and practicing with an idea to get the trick. Lots of people would waste a whole box of toothpicks and not get the trick because they were going through the motions but not studying; not applying the full intelligence of their minds to the work in hand. In the same way hundreds of persons honestly believe that they are studying writing pictures when in reality they have not even begun.

It is a simple thing to learn, if you once can get the trick. We worked seven weeks with the toothpicks and then all of a sudden it came. As a rule it is the same with scripts. You work and study and you seem to learn nothing, and then some morning you wake up and you know all about writing scripts and you go ahead and write and sell.

Others think they are working, but they are not working along the right lines, and they never get anywhere and never will, in spite of the simplicity of the thing once the trick is caught.

In the first place learn what a story—a plot—is, and also what it is not. This story interests you. WHY? This story is "rotten." Again, WHY? Here is a story you think might have been made much better. WHY and HOW? Learn to profit from the mistakes of others.

Then go on to the next step. Learn the construction of the script. Study printed or typewritten examples to see how briefly and yet how explicitly the action is told. Note that it is told in action and not in description. You do not say that Jane enters, bats her eyes, looks sad, clasps her hands and comes slowly to the front of the stage. You say that Jane enters. The run of the story will tell the director whether she enters soulfully or on stilts. You do not tell that the room is eighteen feet deep and three feet wide. It would do you no good if you did. The camera will get the same fan shaped line no matter what you ask for because that is the natural law of optics. In time you will learn to get your scenes in from two to ten lines instead of from fifty to one hundred.

At least you are starting, but you have not gone very far. The concise statement of the scene in action is merely a matter of mechanics, but the next step is a matter of intelligence. This is placing the scenes in their proper order to get the best possible effect. This is partly a matter of practice, but more a matter of intelligence developed by practice. John goes out of a scene. A sixteenth of a second later he is five hundred miles away. How did he get there? If there is nothing in between to show his journey or at least suggest it, use a leader, but instead of using a leader it is better to show John getting on a train, get some other related action in which John does not appear and then run a leader to the effect that John calls on his lawyers, or whatever else he does.

But showing a train means going down to the railroad station and waiting for a train to happen along. Instead, show John with a suitcase shaking hands with someone. He exits. Then someone also exits in another direction. In the next scene someone tells someone else that John has gone. Now the leader and the mind is prepared for John's five-hundred-mile jump.

Now that you get John to the other city follow him and tell what happens next, unless what happens next happens to some other character, perhaps in the town John came from. Do not merely write scenes. Write scenes that mean something. Just the other day a man who knows how to write, but cannot yet write photoplays, admitted that his scenes did not tell much, but "they would make pretty pictures." He was told that he was writing a story, not merely pretty pictures.

But having arranged the scenes in their most logical order, try and see if you cannot make one scene help the other. This morning we wrote a script. The climax happened all in one setting. We wrote it in five scenes because a 200-foot scene would be criminal in a farce comedy. We broke it into thirty-foot lengths and cut out some of the action. To break we had a man looking through a window and laughing at what was inside. If he were merely a man looking through the window, he would not have belonged and he would not have been funny, so we made him the husband of one of the women in the room, and now it was so natural for him to laugh that he would lead the laughter og the audience. We were not born with the inherent knowledge that that was the way to get the most humor of a break cut-back. But we were born with some brains and the rest was practice and study brought to the point where we did it instinctively. Before we wrote the story we knew the scene would run too long and we wrote in the husband all through the play for no other real reason than to use him to cut back to, though we made him work in the earlier scenes as well merely to excuse his presence and get laughs. That's another of your tricks, to give a value to characters introduced for some specific purpose and to make them seem to belong instead of holding them until the precise moment when they are needed, when their sudden and unexplaind introduction will check the interest until the person is mentally accounted for.

So make this your map of study:

Learn what a plot is and why.
Learn to write scenes in action.
Learn when to write scenes and when leaders will be better.
Learn when an insert of some sort will be better than a leader.
Learn to write your scenes in their proper order.
Learn how to make all scenes help the other scenes of the play.

Be concise, complete and comprehensive. Say what you mean, mean what you say, and say it pointedly and with the fullest effect.

Work.

"Why do you always talk about work, and work," asks a correspondent. "Why don't you cheer up sometimes?"

Bless your heart, the most cheering thing in the whole world is the knowledge that work will get us almost anywhere. Were it not for that fact, work would be mere drudgery and not the helpful means to a hopeful end. "Work" is almost synonymous with "hope" except to the lazy, for work is not the hope but the assurance of arrival at a desired consummation. Hope is more or less a chimera. Work is positive; absolute. With work you can win all things, but it must be work and not playing at work. It must be steady, unremitting labor, not merely sporadic effort.

Work, to the worker, is the most blessed word in the language. To the loafer alone it means nothing.

Mr. Wiltermood Says:

Frank M. Wiltermood, a newspaper man, has returned to the Balboa Company as photoplay editor. He writes:

> The company is in the market only for two-reel, three-reel and four-reel dramas. The concern is not producing comedies, costume plays, Indian or civil war scripts, its purpose being to film only high-class feature productions that avoid morbid episodes such as lost memory, alcoholism, kidnapping, crime of all sorts, perversions of humanity, pistol wielding, indelicate parentage of children and other sordid themes. The taboo also is placed against such ancient situations as villains and autos falling over cliffs, characters with birth marks who appear late in the story to learn their identity, the putting of incriminating letters in the hero's pocket, the hero who goes to the West and is followed in after years by his Eastern sweetheart, the moonshiner's daughter who falls in love with a revenue officer, the rich manufacturer's son who uses his father's products and becomes seriously ill, the two sisters or the two brothers who become lost to each other and later engage in conflict, the stealing of necklaces, jewels from the eye of an India god or other precious gems, the European nobleman who comes incognito in America and toils as a menial—or any other of the antique dramatic episodes made trite by usage since Noah sailed the ark.

An Investment.

Just lately a correspondent waxed indignant because he was told that he must type his scripts. This, he argues, is "unfair" since it permits the man who can run a machine to submit hundreds of useless ideas while he, with ideas that he knows are much better than those on the screen, cannot do anything with them.

This sort of communication is irritating. Even a shoestring peddler must make an investment in shoelaces before he can start out as a merchant, and yet a lot of people seem to think that photoplay companies are created for no other purpose than to hand out checks to rank novices. A typewriter can be hired for three months for five dollars. If the man with the ideas that are so much better than those he sees on the screen is not willing to gamble five dollars and a little time on the value of those ideas, he is not entitled to any return. Nothing venture, nothing have was written long before photoplays came in, but the proverb still holds true.

No one is being begged to write scripts these days; at least not the novices. They are told that if they want to try and sell they must have the stuff typed, but as a street car conductor is told he must buy a uniform and a carpenter has to purchase a kit of tools. That's simple enough, isn't it?

Superficial.

It is better to fully assimilate one single fact about photoplay writing (or anything else for that matter) than to get an erroneous impression of a dozen ideas.

Just the other day a reader noted in the inquiry column a statement that the scene plot was not essential, and wanted to know if this had become so since "Technique of the Photoplay" was written. She had the book, but she overlooked the definite statement that the three essentials of the photoplay were the synopsis, the cast and the plot of action and that "a scene plot is useless save to give a hint as to the number of scenes unless the play is so developed that the director follows the script exactly." Probably she read this, but did not assimilate the information, passing on to the instructions for writing the scene plot where such was used.

It is useless to try to write photoplay unless a careful study is made of the subject and every bit of advice is assimilated. Cultivate the habit of thinking over what you have read until you are certain just what a statement means before passing on to the next. It is the only way to get ahead

Go Lose It.

We are violating no trade secret when we announce that while gunpowder is used to shoot a projectile out of a gun or cannon, the powder does not accompany the hereinbefore mentioned projectile in its flight.

In the same way, a starting idea may be used to shoot a plot on its journey and yet be left behind. While this is no new discovery, it is one that still seems to be a stranger to a lot of people who write "I read your excellent department every week."

Came to us lately a lady with an idea. Some of it was good, but it was weighted down by a lot of undischarged gunpowder in the shape of an original starter. She was urged to take it home and lose it. She came back with the same product of the Du Ponts hanging around. It was still bad, so we took the idea from her and wrote a salable story that had not the slightest suggestion of the original plot.

She could not lose the idea because that was the central idea of the story. All else she thought she thought about that one thing, and while some of the added thoughts were good the main idea was too poor to pass, and so it kept on clogging the plot and the action. Dropping that and using the comparatively new development it suggested made it useful.

Learn to discard any element of the story that becomes unpromising, no matter how good it may have looked at first. It is the only way in which you will ever get ahead. If you have a story and another one comes along and fights for the place and looks better than the first, retire the first, take the second and perhaps you can take up the first later on and either get a story then or graft another story off of it.

Any man can dig into the rock and bring out copper ore mixed with gold. He gets the day wages of the laborer. The chemist who devises means for separating the gold from the copper gets more wages, because he works with his intelligence. Your original plot may be mixed gold and base metal. Learn to separate the two and use that which is the better. As a novice you will be apt to hold to the first idea and "fix" that us, because that is what you started with. The trained writer knows how to tell the gold from the copper. More than that, he will switch in the middle of a story if a new development presents itself and discard the original climax entirely. You will remain in the novice class just so long as you persist in using the plot you started with to the detriment of the new ideas that present themselves.

Just for an example we have written two comedies on the title of a dramatic two-reeler and we have not yet read the story of the two-reel drama. Probably it is a good drama, but the point is that there were the suggestions for two farce comedies in the title alone.

More!

Here are some extracts from another of those circulars:

"Experience and education not essential."

Experience, meaning practice, is most assuredly essential. A fair education is not essential, but advisable.

"Invalids can succeed."

Invalids may possibly succeed, but a healthy and alert mind is one of the essentials.

"Learn in five days' time."

Taken in connection with the statement that the investment of one dollar will enable the purchaser to write photoplays, this five-day limit is a downright lie. The price has been reduced to 50 cents, we believe.

"Each story accepted means from $25 to $150 for you."

Many companies still pay from ten to twenty dollars each for scripts. The statement is not correct.

The circular further advertises "valuable advice of Mr. Lawrence McCloskey, of the Lubin Company."

We are sending the circular on to Mr. McCloskey. He has given valuable advice, but not to schools. The use of his name is not authorized. It was Emmet Campbell Hall, of the same company, who was the last straw on the back on the National Authors' Institute. We hope that this is an augury.

Teaching.

One of the most appreciated compliments we ever received came in a recent letter from a correspondent in whom we have been interested for a couple of years. He has grown beyond the labored, words-of-one-syllable stuff, and when he called for help recently we told him what the matter was and left him to find out the cure, feeling certain that the diagnosis would permit him to find his own remedy. We simply told him that he tried to cover too much ground in his premise—the start of the story—and told more than was needed. Back came this letter:

> I wonder if you realize that you have a gift even more rare than that of authorship—that of teaching. The real teacher never states things baldly. He merely puts the proper spade into the hands of the student for that student to dig out his own information. Instead of writing "ten pages" about how a gold mine looks inside you use 30 words to point the way to the mouth of the mine and say, "Go in and dig." Thus, your little hint did me more good than many pages would have done, and I have conquered that lagging premise.

That should be the point of all teaching, to direct thought, not to endeavor to do the thinking for the pupil, and if you will guide your own studies along the same line, you'll get where this writer has done, practically unaided, in something like two years.

When you ask the way, don't expect to be lifted into an auto or a magic carpet and be transported thither. Find your direction and do your own walking. It is vastly better for your legs, whether physical or mental.

Tricks.

When a man tells us that he cannot possibly help having twenty-five interior sets in a one-reel story we speak to him as he deserves. When a woman tells us the same thing we wait until she goes out and then pray for a book agent to come along so we can tell him what we think of him and relieve the brain of the stored up remarks. Now look at this.

We want to use an office set once in which to have a letter delivered. Ans. We don't. The messenger meets the man just coming out of the office building.

We want to use a kitchen once to establish the cook. Ans. We don't. The cook comes to the back door.

We want to use a parlor for a proposal. Ans. He proposes on the front steps.

We want to use a bedroom to show the old maid's wig. Ans. We use a bust instead.

We want to use a physician's office to show that Jack is a doctor. Ans. We bring him out of the house with a satchel such as doctors use. He opens the satchel, looks at some bottles, and goes on.

We want to use a theater set to show the heroine is an actress. Ans. We use a billboard with eighteen cents' worth of stock lithographs.

We must use a railroad station scene to show that Bill buys a ticket to Texas. Ans. Show the platform. Bill comes from the station with the ticket in his hand.

We must show the interior of a street car to show that Frank has no carfare. Ans. Show Frank search his pockets. He can find no money. He takes a chance and boards a car. The car comes into the next scene. Frank is put off.

We must show a steamer to show that Frank goes to Europe. Ans. Use a leader.

We must have a toy store to show that the Colonel buys a present for little Geraldine. Ans. Show him entering a toy store. Cut back to Geraldine. Show the Colonel coming out of the store with a package. Show him giving it to Geraldine.

We could film a couple of pages with similar avoidances, but these instances should be enough. If you a-b-s-o-l-u-t-e-l-y M-U-S-T show all exteriors you can even show a death bed or a man in prison on a lawn. Don't think you cannot. Know that you can.

No. Reasons.

Here are some of the reasons recently advanced for taking up photoplay writing:

"To show my husband I could earn as much money as he could."

"My father was a literary man, too."

"My compositions were always praised at school."

"I have nothing to do in the afternoons."

"I guess I am as good as ———."

"I have had a spell of sickness and need some money."

"I said to myself I could do better than the awful stuff I see in the theatres."

Can you beat it?

Inquiries

Note.—Inquirers dealing with photoplay technique will be replied to by mail if the questioner will inclose with his question a stamped and fully addressed return envelope. These inquiries must be addressed, Inquiry Department, The Moving Picture World, Box 226, Madison Square Station, New York City, and in no other manner. Requests for lists of manufacturers' addresses should be addressed to the paper and not to this department.

S. G.—A photoplay "can" be made from a copyrighted book, just as you "can" steal a man's watch, but it is not well to be caught at it. The sale of a book to you gives you the right to read it and loan it to your friend to read. The copyright line is legal notice to you that if you do more than that you invade the rights reserved by the author.

F. A. R.—Do not evoke such unpleasant memories. For modern talking pictures try Edison or the Imperial. The company you mention curled up its toes in the long agone leaving several sincere mourners.

Technique of the Photoplay

(Second Edition)

By EPES W. SARGENT

Not a line reprinted from the first edition, but an entirely new and exhaustive treatise of the Photoplay in its every aspect, together with a dictionary of technical terms and several sample scripts.

One hundred and seventy-six pages of actual text.

Special chapters on Developing the "Punch," Condensing the Script, Writing the Synopsis, Multiple Reel Stories, Talking Pictures, Copyrights, etc.

In cloth, two dollars. Full leather, three dollars.

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD

17 Madison Avenue, New York City

Projection Department

Conducted by F. H. RICHARDSON

Manufacturers' Notice.

IT is an established rule of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD and of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until such articles have been demonstrated to a member of our staff. In case of apparatus pertaining to projection this means the editor of this department.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two to three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending 4 cents in stamps (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply by mail without delay.

The first seventy-four questions are now ready and printed in neat booklet form. They may be obtained by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy. You may be surprised at the number of questions you cannot answer without a lot of study.

Question No. 45.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Permission to use the contributor's name must accompany each answer, otherwise only the name of the city will be used. Theater managers looking for high-class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

What voltage generator would you recommend if it is to supply incandescent lighting only? If it is to supply projection current only? If it is to supply both? Give reasons for each reply. How low could the voltage of an ordinary compound-wound generator be, and still operate a projection arc successfully? How high could it be? Is resistance absolutely necessary in series with a projection arc supplied by an ordinary compound-wound or shunt generator of large or small capacity. Give full details and reasons for your answer. Many things are involved here, so consider carefully.

Roll of Honor.

The Roll of Honor on Question No. 39 consists of A. C. Stewart, Waitsburg, Washington; Harry T. Dobson, Toronto, Canada, and Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas.

Reply to Question No. 39.

By Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas.

The Question:

Suppose you received from the authorities permission to drive your projectors with motors. Your employer owned two small motors of proper voltage. How would you determine whether or not the motors were heavy enough for the work? Suppose these motors were found to be of sufficient power, but there were no field rheostats to govern the speed. You could get plenty of small iron wire, about the size of a wire on a broom, how could you, without any figuring, determine accurately and quickly how much of this wire would be sufficient?

The Answer:

There are two ways of determining whether a motor is heavy enough to pull a projection mechanism. First, if your motor does not heat above normal after running an ordinary reel you may conclude that it is large enough for the work. Second, you can take the voltage and the ampere capacity from the name plate and multiply the two together and divide by 746, which will give you the horse-power, and while ⅛ horse-power is large enough, ¼ horse-power would be better, and would be ample for the work in hand. You could, of course, ascertain by correspondence with the manufacturer of your projector the horse-power required to operate it, and this would perhaps be the simplest way.

That part of the question dealing with field resistance is best replied to by A. C. Stewart, Waitsburg, Washington, who says:

If you have no field rheostat to govern the speed, disconnect one end of the field winding from its terminal and connect it to some fine iron wire. Now touch the terminal from which you disconnected the field winding with the other end of the iron wire, turn on the current, and by sliding the iron wire back and forth on the terminal, with the load on the motor, you can find the exact spot which will give the right results. By marking this spot, and winding the iron wire in spirals and mounting these spirals on insulators, and making a sliding or other suitable contact, you will have created a field rheostat with which you can regulate the speed of the motor. In making the experimental test care must be taken that the iron wire is not short circuited on itself at any point or points as this would cause an erroneous reading.

A Real Manager.

Recently the management of the Goodwin theater, Newark, New Jersey, employed the writer to go over to their house and examine their projection, criticize the same and make suggestions for improvement. The Goodwin theater is managed by William Webbe and his mother, Mrs. Charles Webbe, but, insofar as the actual management of the house be concerned, Mrs. Webbe was the real "man behind the gun," and a mighty capable "man" she is, too. The Goodwin theater is, within its limits, as pleasing a house to the eye as the writer has looked at in many a day. By "within its limitations" I mean that it is merely one long, wide room, with a ceiling panelled with heavy beams. The walls and ceiling are of a most pleasing shade of deep tan, panelled in a very light tan, and the indirect lighting system employed in connection therewith gives one of the most restful and thoroughly distributed illuminating effects it has been my fortune to observe. The ushering is done by young ladies, and the term "young ladies" means just what it says; they are handsome young women and not frivolous girls.

The day of my visit Kleine's "Cleopatra" was on, and although it was a matinee, price 15 cents and in the middle of summer, the house was fairly well filled. In the evening the prices were 15 to 25 cents. Mrs. Webbe was busy at the switchboard, handling the house lights and the careful attention she gave to that detail was illustrative of her thoroughness.

The picture was good, too, but it was not sufficiently good to suit Mrs. Webbe. The light was brilliant; it was well handled and the speed was correct, but Mrs. Webbe informed me that these various things were only so because she watched the picture every moment of the time and promptly notified the operator when anything was wrong. Now, it is a matter of regret to me to have to chronicle that fact, but in the interest of the operator himself, as well as the organization to which he belongs and to the business as a whole, it is necessary to do so. The management of the Goodwin is paying the union scale; it is willing to pay much more than the union scale if necessary, in order to secure the class of service it wants and, gentlemen of the Newark union, under these conditions it is absolutely up to you to provide Mrs. Webbe with an operator who will meet her requirements, even though it should be necessary to go outside of your own union to procure that kind of a man.

I do not wish to be understood as intimating that it would be necessary to go outside of your organization, but in this case you are dealing with a real manager, a woman who very thoroughly understands what she wants, who is determined to have what she wants, and who is willing to pay the price, even to the extent of very considerable above the union scale. The union scale in Newark is $18.00. I suggested to Mrs. Webbe that $18.00 was not sufficient to attract a really high-class operator. She inquired how much would be necessary. I told her that I thought, in a city like Newark, $25.00 would do it. Quick as a flash she said: "I will pay it gladly for a man who will put high-class projection on my screen and keep it there." By this Mrs. Webbe meant a man to whom she could deliver the films with the confidence that they would be projected to her screen in the best possible manner without any coaching on her part; that they would not be run too fast—nor too slow; that no shadows would appear on her screen; that there would be no travel ghost, or any other fault in the projection, except that inherent in the films themselves.

In order to secure this kind of projection it would be necessary that the operator give his whole and undivided attention to the screen every second the picture was running. Mrs. Webbe spoke very highly of the personality of her operator, but the fact remains that he is not delivering the goods on that class of job. I believe he is a man who will make a first-class operator some day, but there were faults. There was travel ghost, but he was too far from the screen to observe the focus of the picture closely without an opera glass; there was altogether too much light in the operating room; there was a fault in both his projection lenses, and although he knew it was there, he didn't know what it was, and, while the foregoing might not be counted very heavily against him, he did not, according to Mrs. Webbe, watch his screen continuously and thus, from time to time, grave faults appeared; also I saw one reel started with the title out of frame, which is decidedly crude work.

Illustrative of the willingness of the management of the Goodwin to spend money to get results, the first thing I did was to suggest to Mrs. Webbe that the operator ought to have a pair of good opera glasses with which to look at his picture and see if the focus was at its best. Mrs. Webbe disappeared and in five minutes was back with three pairs of high-class glasses which we tried out, and, if I remember rightly, she bought the $12.50 pair. Now, gentlemen of the Newark union, it is not a question of money in the Goodwin theater. Of course, Mrs. Webbe, being a real manager, is not going to throw any money away, but she is willing to pay the price necessary to get results, and it is up to you.

I have expended considerable space in describing this condition, for the simple reason that this is the same thing other unions are confronted with. There are, in almost all cities, managers who want results and are willing to pay for them, but it is not every union which contains within its ranks men who can and will deliver this class of work.

The management of the Goodwin is going to succeed, and it is very much up to the Newark union to help them succeed, because the class of projection Mrs. Webbe insists upon is going to force other Newark houses to do likewise, and this will necessitate the paying of higher prices for higher class work.

By the way, I nearly overlooked one important feature of the Goodwin. Mr. William Webbe has charge of the music. Mr. Webbe is an accomplished musician and the theater is equipped with a magnificent organ. Mr. Webbe sees every picture before he plays for it and plans and arranges the music and effects. Too much cannot be said in praise of his work in this connection.

After leaving the Goodwin I went around to another house where they have a new Baird projector, and a mirror screen. There was a heavy and disagreeable flicker, and at one time a nice golden yellow discoloration of the light which extended half way up the picture, yet when I called the operator's attention to it he did no know what I was talking about. In justice, however, it must be said that the regular operator, who is also the manager, was absent, but the fact remains that the audience was paying the regular admission price, and therefore, the class of work I witnessed was rather tough on them. It is a matter of sincere regret to me to be obliged to say this, but right is right, and there is no excuse for such work. In this instance the doorkeeper left the door, went up and gave the operator my card, and the operator left his machine, came clear around through another room, down a flight of stairs and talked for probably thirty seconds before inviting me up to the operating room, though I believe there was a reel boy with the machine, but of this I am not certain; it runs in my mind I saw a boy there. After leaving this house I went to the Strand theater, where I met brothers V. A. Schaube and J. V. Valentine, both of the Newark local. The brothers were working under some difficulties, as there is altogether too much light in the operating room, and they are taking current from a generator which is not heavy enough for the work. Under these conditions I do not care to comment on the results.

License Information—Again.

Arapahoe, Nebraska, writes:

> I have been operating in this part of the state for the past two years without, however, securing a license. I would now like to go to a larger city, preferably Kansas City. Can you tell me how to proceed to get a license? I believe I am competent to operate any show to the satisfaction of the manager and all concerned, but I have never taken a license examination, and am absolutely ignorant as to how to proceed to get one, and get a job.

In the first place, Arapahoe, if you went to Kansas City or any other large place where there is a union, you would have to apply for membership and be received into the union before you could go to work in any house controlled by the union, also before your application to the union could even be considered you would have to reside in the city for a period of six months. This may seem to you arbitrary and unreasonable, but there is a very good and logical cause for the six months' residence requirement. The getting of a position in a large city is no different from getting a position in a small town; you have simply got to find the opening, apply for the job, get it, and then make good, except that as a general proposition all houses employing union men obtain their operators directly from the business offices of the organization, and in many cities they cannot obtain them otherwise without having the scrappiest kind of a scrap on their hands. As to a license you would have to apply to the proper authorities in the city in which you wish to work, and the method of application, as well as the department to which you apply, varies in different cities. You would then have to be examined, and in some cities, New York for example, the examination is very stiff, whereas in others it is merely a farce. The examination is an oral one, and is whatever the individual examiner sees fit to make it. Some of them merely ask you if the moon is made of green cheese, collect the fee and give you a license; others may vary the performance by inquiring as to the probable state of the weather tomorrow before they collect the fee, while in other cities you will have to have a very thorough understanding of electrical action, some knowledge of lens action, and a comprehensive knowledge of the motion picture mechanism in order to pass the examination and secure a license. As a rule cities giving a really effective examination either charge no license fee at all or a merely nominal one, while in many instances cities in which the examinaton is a farce exact a stiff fee. In the latter municipalities it is, of course, simply a grafting proposition. It is a case of "cough up" if you want to work.

Electrical Books.

J. Beardsley, who fails to give his place of residence, says:

> On page 1258, May 30th issue, under heading "Westinghouse Reflector," you say: "Ohio orders Swoope's book." Kindly let me know what book this is. Have both Handbooks, and like to keep informed on good electrical works.

The book referred to is Swoopes "Lessons in Practical Electricity," 14th addition, which can be had by remitting $2.00 to the editor, who will forward same to the publisher. However, I have unearthed a much better set of works, in six limp bound, leather covered, gilt edged volumes, entitled "Hawkins' Electrical Guide." This work is $6.00 and can be had by remitting $1.00 to the Theo Audel Company, whose address can be obtained from their advertisement in the July 11th issue, and then paying $1.00 per week until the sum of $6.00 has been paid. This set of works is very good indeed, and, taken in conjunction with the Motion Picture Handbook, will form a very excellent operator's library, though in addition it would not do any harm to have a copy of "The Electric Motor," by Burns, which can be obtained by remitting $1.50 and a stamped envelope to the editor, who will forward the order to the publisher. Both the Hawkins' set and the Burns' book have the hearty endorsement of this department. Swoope's work is also excellent.

The Reading of Motor Curve Performances.

I break my rule of having nothing but original matter in the department by inserting the following,, which was sent in by a correspondent. Unfortunately I do not know the name of the publication from which it was clipped. It will be well for operators who handle motors to study this article carefully, using their own motors to make comparative tests on. They may unearth some very valuable information concerning their own plants.

> Every person who owns, or ever expects to own or have charge of an electric motor should be able to read motor performance curves. These tell the whole story of the motor's capabilities and limitations at almost a glance to those who can read curves—but to the average person, and even to many engaged in electrical pursuits, a performance curve drawing looks something like a railroad map and there his information ends. Consequently he denies himself, many times to his disadvantage, information that might prove exceedingly valuable.

Nowadays, more than ever before, motors are sold on their "curves." It is not enough to simply say a motor has 25 horsepower capacity, because a 25 horsepower motor might mean several things. For instance, it can mean that the motor's momentary maximum output is 25 horsepower; or that its output is 25 horsepower at rated voltage for one-half hour, or maybe for one or two hours or continuously. It is true that electrical associations have laid down rules, but each motor manufacturer, nevertheless, rates motors according to his own ideas.

The result is that electrical engineers and all experienced motor buyers now demand curves showing the actual performance of the motor under all conditions of service. A motor performance curve drawing shows the exact output in horsepower for all speeds, the amount of current or amperes it consumes for any horsepower or speed with its capacity, the torque or turning power developed, and the efficiency, under all conditions.

The curves here shown give the performance of a direct current motor rated by its manufacturer at 20 horsepower. Each curve on the drawing is read between the ampere scale across the bottom, and its own scale along the side. In the drawing, "Torque" means pounds pull exerted at one foot radius (from the shaft); "H.P." means horsepower; "R.P.M." means revolutions of the shaft per minute; "Efficiency" means per cent. of current of amperes converted into useful work.

To find the operating characteristics of this motor, locate the point where, at its normal rating, 20 horsepower, the "H.P. Output" curve intersects the 20 H.P. horizontal line. This point, it is seen, is on the 75 ampere vertical line (scale across bottom of drawing); at 20 horsepower then, the motor takes 75 amperes of current. The other characteristics are indicated by the different curves at the points where they intersect the 75 ampere line. Thus, by following the 75 ampere line down to the "Torque" line, it is seen by referring to the side scale, that the torque developed is 160 pounds; similarly its "Speed" is found to be 660 r. p. m. and its "efficiency" a trifle over 88 per cent.

Now as another example assume that it is desired to know the conditions if this same motor was put to 25 horsepower? service. By the same method we see that to do this extra work, It will consume 93 amperes; develops 220 pounds of torque, but the speed is reduced to 580 r. p. m., and the efficiency is now under 88 per cent.

The drawing shows that this motor can develop as high as 49 horsepower (end of "H. P. Output" curve), but this is inadvisable, for while the torque is then over 600 pounds, the speed is only 420 r. p. m., and the efficiency drops way down to 78 per cent.

The rated output of the motor is, therefore, somewhat arbitrary. Any high grade motor has considerable range of power to take care of overloads. The momentary overload capacity should be about three times the rated capacity, so it is of great importance to know just what the motor can stand and what change will result in the speed, and how the overload affects the torque, the efficiency, and the current taken from the supply circuit.

By following this explanation, the performance curve of any motor can be intelligently read by anyone.

Ozo-Carbi Light.

From time to time this department has inquiries concerning the practicability and efficiency of various light making outfits. It is, of course, beyond the province of the department to draw comparison as between various outfits. We can, however, and, in fact, it is a part of the office of this department to set forth the facts concerning various devices connected with the operating room. Moore, Hubbell & Co., Chicago, Illinois, are the manufacturers of the outfit for making "ozo-carbi" light. This light is made by burning carbide (acetylene) gas with a compound gas called "ozo," which is really a modified form of oxygen. These two gases are used together in the same kind of a jet as that used for ordinary oxygen and hydrogen in making the regular calcium, or lime light. In making ozo-carbi, two tanks are employed, one for the carbide and one for the ozo gas. For a long time after carbide or acteylene gas became a commercial article, attempts were made to utilize it for calcium light, but until the perfection of the gas compound known as ozo it was not a practical proposition. The brilliancy of calcium light depends entirely upon the degree of heat to which the lime can be raised, just as the brilliancy of the electric arc depends upon the degree of heat to which the carbon can be raised. The hotter the lime the brighter the light. Now it is claimed, and I think the claim is a just one, that acetylene or carbide gas has a more intense heat, and hence produces a brighter light than any other known single gas. Oxygen and acetylene cannot be burned together in a calcium jet, so that the secret of the Moore-Hubbell process lies in the production of the compound ozo which will do what plain oxygen will not do—play in the same yard with calcium gas, or, in other words, burn in the same jet, the same as oxygen and hydrogen burn together. The manufacturers claim that, not only will this light produce a greater brilliancy, but that it will do it for less money than will a plain oxygen-hydrogen calcium light. With this outfit no saturator or vaporizer is required; there is no gasoline, nor is any ether employed. The gases can be made by burning and storing under pressure in steel tanks provided, whereupon they are ready for use at any time.

In Figure 1 we see the portion of the outfit used for making the ozo gas. A is an ordinary plumber's furnace for heating the retort, though any form of heat may be used. R is a shield to go over the retort and help confine the heat, thus making it more intense. C is a retort in which the chemicals are placed, and to which heat is applied to generate the gas. DD is a compound wash-bottle which is filled with water. The gas, as it is made, must pass through this water, which frees it from impurities, whereupon it passes through high pressure hose E, and into the main tank, where it is confined by needle valve V. There is a safety valve provided, so that the element of danger is eliminated. With one set of chemicals, called Chemical No. 1, it is necessary to first fill the main tank with fifty or sixty pounds of air by means of a hand pump, but by using a second set of somewhat more costly chemicals, known as Chemical No. 2, no air is necessary. The process of making ozo gas is very simple, indeed, and the directions sent out with the outfit are remarkably complete, so that even the novice cannot possibly have much trouble in handling the outfit. Enough gas is made at one time to last for several shows.

Figure 2 shows the carbide making part of the outfit. The process is the reverse of the old way of dropping water on the carbide. The carbide is contained in a basket at the top of tank P. This basket has a false bottom which is raised or lowered by crank O. Water is first placed in the tank up to a certain level, then basket K is filled with carbide and the basket is inserted into the tank, whereupon, by revolving crank O the carbide is gradually spilled over the top of the basket (which is not really a basket at all, but a cylinder with an open top end) onto the surface of the water, where it is instantly transformed into gas. The gas supplies its own pressure, and the tank is charged at 30 pounds. The whole process, as I said before, is remarkably simple, and it seems to me that any one of ordinary intelligence ought to be able to handle the outfit with the aid of the instructions supplied. Both the outfit and the gas has the indorsement and approval of this department.

The Heating of Glass.

Some time ago considerable was said on the glass heating problem, and the answer given, several times, was probably the correct solution of the matter. John Griffiths, in a discussion of this subject, brought up the question of the absorption of light rays, and their relation to the heating effect. Perhaps some of his difficulties may be cleared up by the following, contributed by S. E. Shaw, Ithaca, New York.

In the first place, it probably will not be amiss to ask what is the nature of light? It is a form of radiant energy which acts in waves, the frequency of which determines the nature of the result. At one end of the scale is sound having a frequency of 15 cycles per sec. for the lowest audible sound, running up through wireless waves, visible light, and on up to ultra-violet light, having a frequency of about 10^{15}. The wave length of the lowest sound is about 66 feet, and that of the ultra-violet light about .00001 inches in length. (The brother should have explained, in detail, precisely what is meant by "wave length." Presumably he means that sound waves are the distances named from each other.—Ed.) These are all forms of radiation, and since they are energy they must finally be dissipated in the form of heat. Therefore, if light is absorbed by a medium, there is bound to be a rise in temperature in proportion to the amount of light absorbed. But here is the point, all light rays are heat rays, but do all heat rays have the nature of light? This is evidently not the case. Between the frequencies of wireless and Herzian waves and invisible light waves there is a field called infra red rays, the exact nature of which is not known. Formerly they were called heat waves but that was incorrect. It is merely a form of radiation which possesses greater heat quantities than the other forms, and, since they do not manifest themselves visually, audibly, or magnetically, it was naturally thought that they were a special form of heat wave. This is the principal form of radiation from the sun by which the earth receives its heat supply. They receive their name, infra-red, from the fact that they are below the visible red rays in frequency, and while really a red ray, are not visible to the eye. Now, an electric arc not only gives off light, but also a great amount of radiation in another form, a good share of which is in the nature of infra-red rays. The luminous efficiency of the d. c. arc (percentage of radiation propagated as visible light) is 1.66 per cent., so that evidently the other forms are very large in proportion to the actual light produced. Since the infra-red rays are large in comparison to the light rays, and give up the most heat, the greater heating effect will be due to these rays and not to the light rays, and thus we see that the glass does not get hot exactly in proportion to the light which it absorbs.

The piece of blackened tin will, of course, get hotter than the polished tin. Here again, the right rays are not entirely responsible for the heating effect. The heat rays, or invisible rays, follow the laws of light for reflection. Therefore the heat rays, as well as the visible rays, are reflected from the polished surface, but the black surface is a very good absorber, in fact, a perfect black body is a perfect absorber, or radiator. For this reason the lamp house of a machine should get considerably hotter if carbon is allowed to collect on the inside walls than if it were kept well cleaned and polished, and also a black film will get hotter in the aperature than a clear piece of celluloid. The rougher a surface, the greater will be its absorbtion. In the experiment mentioned by Griffiths, the temperature, as registered by the thermometer, cannot be taken as a measure of heat, unless the pieces of iron or tin are of the same dimensions and material. Temperature is simply a measure of heat intensity, and not one of quantity. This is evident, for it takes more heat to raise the temperature of a certain body to some certain point than it does to raise the temperature of a smaller body of the same material to the same point. Would it be worth while to carry out experiments to find the heat absorbed by different materials, at various points before the light enters the condensers, and after leaving them? Your department should certainly be a boon to the operator, for it not only helps him out in his difficulties, but greatly increases his knowledge along certain lines in a way which the best correspondence schools could not even commence to do. Perhaps you won't like the comparison, for your pages certainly show anything but love for the schools that would make a Steinmetz of young or old for $100 a chance, or less. I wish you and your department the best of success.

I do not feel competent to enter into a discussion of this particular matter. I have printed this exceedingly well-written letter because anything which increases our knowledge of the action of radiant energy is valuable to the operator, and certainly there is considerable in this letter well worthy of study, though I hardly imagine that the practical advantage gained would justify the labor necessary to carry out the experiments suggested, and determine the amount of energy absorbed at various points ahead of and behind the condensers. But, of course, anything of that kind is more or less interesting, purely as an experiment.

Yellow in Projection Surface.

In a recent comment the editor expressed skepticism as to the desirability of yellow in a projection surface, and for this he was taken to task by the Atsco Company, manufacturers of the radium gold fibre screen. Now the editor has nothing to apologize for in this connection, and therefore does not purpose to apologize. However, it is but fair to say that he only expressed his own individual opinion, and after an extended argument with some of the experts of the aforenamed company he is willing to admit that he may be in error. The claim of the advocators of the radium gold fibre screen is that yellow serves to soften the harshness of the white light, and that the effect is not a diminution of the brilliancy of the light, but a changing of its tone. In other words, they claim that, while admitting that the introduction of yellow into the light ray itself would tend to not only decrease the brilliancy of the ray, but work injury in other directions, the introduction of yellow into the surface has no such effect, but only, as before indicated, serves to soften the tone, and eliminate the halo or glare which is to some extent present when perfectly white semi-reflecting screen surfaces are used.

The editor has pointed out to the Atsco people the fact that the columns of this department are at all times open to them, or to anyone else, to set forth any argument or any proof they may have of the correctness of their position in this or any other matter pertaining to projection. This department has no "axe to grind" for anybody. It seeks only wholly and solely to serve the best interests of the projection end of the moving picture industry as a whole. Primarily it, of course, to a certain extent, purports to represent the moving picture operator, but beyond, and further than this it also represents all things having to do with projection.

If a yellow surface is the best surface we want to know it, and if it is a fact that a yellow tint in the projection surface adds to the general results, then the question naturally arises how far should this yellow tinting be carried; what is the limit—the point where increased efficiency ceases and deterioration in results sets in? This is a very live topic, and we welcome discussion from the experts of the Atsco Company, or anyone else capable of shedding light on the screen question.

Swindled by a School.

Brooklyn, New York, writes:

> May a new reader of the World, and a would-be-operator, ask a question or two? I am a "graduate" of one of our numerous operators' "schools" who failed to pass the city examination for a license. Out of a dozen questions asked by the examiners only one was ever even so much as mentioned at my "school," and that was the carrying capacity of wires. They (presumably the examining board.—Ed.) told me I did not know how to operate a lamp on a. c. The only question pertaining at all to a. c. was concerning the using of a rheostat on d. c. and changing to a. c. What effect would this have on the amperage? I answered that it would increase the amperage. It seems to me my answer was correct, but they say no. I made no explanation of why the amperes were increased, simply answering as above. Can you tell me where I was wrong? Have you any information, or can you tell me where to get it, concerning rheostats in projection circuits, and how to properly test the rheostat for ground when not in circuit? Also a more complete explanation of the three-wire system? I am going to try for a license again and would gladly purchase this information or instruction, but I am through with schools.

Now here is a man who has been swindled out of a tuition fee. That is harsh language, but it is the straight truth. Without exception, I believe, these schools solicit students on the representation that they will make practical operators of students and enable them to secure a license. Of course, the student ought to have sense enough to know that he cannot learn a trade or a profession in a month or in three months. Common sense should tell him that a trade which could be learned in three months is not worth learning, but it seems that it does not. This, however, does not relieve the school from the charge of questionable practice.

With regard to your answer that the effect of changing from d. c. to a. c., same voltage, with a rheostat for resistance; it was absolutely correct. There would be no difference whatever in the electrical results, except that the amperage at the arc would be somewhat increased, and if the rheostat coils were already working to capacity on d. c. they would be overloaded on a. c. This is due to the fact that an a. c. arc is considerably shorter than a d. c. arc of equal amperage, and therefore has less resistance. I do not think, if you made that answer, and made it in that way, the examiners told you you were wrong. If they did it was you who were right and the examiners who were wrong. It is safe to say, however, that you are in error in saying that the examiners declared that answer wrong. I have, myself, time and again switched from a. c. to d. c., without making any change whatever in my rheostatic resistance, but the use of resistance on a. c. is poor practice, since more than half the energy is wasted, whereas a transformer wastes almost nothing at all.

The information on rheostats contained in the Handbook is very complete and I do not know of any work anywhere that even approaches the Handbook in completeness on this particular subject. As to testing the rheostat for ground when not in circuit, it would take up too much space and require considerable illustration. Moreover, I don't like to give it in this connection anyhow; it would look too much like deliberately coaching you on an examination question. I would suggest, Brooklyn, that you go just outside New York City limits, and serve an apprenticeship, combining it with study. It will be a slower process, but a much better one, and a more effective one. The examiners don't want you to have a lot of answers by heart; they want you to know what you are talking about, and when you get your knowledge through a combination of experience and study, the information obtained is real information, because it means a thorough understanding of the whys and wherefores of the matter.

Getting Light.

Walter C. Rawles, Suffolk, Virginia, asks:

> Can a good picture be projected at 71 feet, using 60 cycle, 110 volt a. c., 40 amperes, through a Fort Wayne compensarc having a capacity of 30 to 60 amperes, using 5/8 carbons? Any suggestions will be appreciated. We use No. 4 wire from the main switch to the machine room, and No. 6 from the main machine room switch to the projectors.

You have not told me either what kind of curtain you use, or what size picture, both of which are exceedingly important items. By very careful work, using a 5/8 inch cored carbon above and a 1/2 inch or 9-16 cored carbon below, you might project a very fair 12-foot picture on one of the semi-reflecting types of screens, but if it be a plaster or a cloth screen, or if the picture be larger than 12 feet you should by all means use 60 amperes. I am only telling you what you might do, but that does not mean you ought to do it. For myself I would not for a moment consider anything less than 60 amperes, and for that 60 amperes I would try first 3/4 cored above and 5/8 cored below; second 5/8 cored above and 9/16 cored below, using whichever gave the best general results. Your wiring is O. K., but in this connection I would call your undivided attention to pages 197 to 201 and 204 to 212 inclusive of the Handbook, a copy of which I suppose you have. If you have not I would humbly suggest that you get busy and remit $2.50 to the Moving Picture World and get one without delay. It will be the best investment, I think, you ever made.

Worth a Hundred.

A. C. Stewart, Waitsburg, Washington, sends 25 cents for the question booklet, and says:

> Have squandered six simoleons for a set of Hawkins' Electrical Guide. They fully justify your recommendation. At a rough guess I should say there is about a hundred dollars' worth of information in each one.

Friend Stewart, for your information I will say I am mighty careful not to recommend a thing until I am thoroughly satisfied it is really worth the money, and will deliver the goods along the lines intended. This applies not only to books, but to machines, appliances and everything else connected with projection.

A New Publication.

The Flickerless Publishing Company, Boston, Mass., comes out with a four-page publication called "The Flickerless," the same being, as I understand it, fathered by the Corbett Theater Equipment Company. Presumably the publication proposes to serve a purely local field, and incidentally to act as a convenient advertising medium for the Corbett Theater Equipment Company.

Volume 1, No. 1, of the publication contains a number of items of local interest, and, as a means of purveying strictly local news doubtless the new publication will find a fertile field, and an appreciative following.

Comments on the Films

Licensed

"HIS KID SISTER" (Vitagraph), July 27.—Good western, although perhaps the best of it is the fearless riding and the atmosphere.

"A CANINE RIVAL" (Edison), July 27.—This is the eighth of the Wood B. Wedd series. William B. Wadsworth pursues his funny bent and makes mirth. He is aided by Arthur Housman. The hit of the piece is a short and sharp argument between a cat and a dog. Neither is hurt.

"GWENDOLYN, THE SEWING MACHINE GIRL" (Biograph), July 27.—There are in this melodramatic comedy situations that moved to mirth—as, for instance, the humble sewing machine girl going to her home of luxury and having her drooping spirits revived by quaffing champagne from the tall glass ordinarily associated in the mind with imported beer.

"SEARCH, THE SCIENTIFIC DETECTIVE" (Biograph), July 27.—On the same reel is this short comedy, not very rich in fun.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL NO. 43.—Interesting number as a whole. There were good views of the Larchmont yacht race, of the baby hippo and of the printing of United States currency.

"THE MYSTERY OF THE LOST STRADIVARIUS" (Edison), July 28.—This is the ninth mystery in the "Chronicles of Cleek" series. The plot embraces the story of the lost Stradivarius written by Thomas W. Hanshaw; George A. Lessey is the director. The usual cast headed by Ben Wilson obtains in this offering. We wish to say in connection with this photoplay that the acting, photography and all else is of a high order. The complications in the plot are of a most interesting nature.

"A CLASH OF VIRTUES" (Essanay), July 28.—A young employe of a Wall street broker forges his employer's check to make good on his margin in a wheat deal. He loses and is given a certain time to redeem himself. His sister is involved and to save her brother she makes a heroic effort to clear things up, even to the sacrifice of herself. The plot of this offering embraces several peculiar complications that are absolutely absurd. Otherwise it is entertaining.

"THE STRAITS OF BONIFACIO" (Saridina), (Pathe), July 28.—On the same reel with "Hemp Growing." The Straits of Bonifacio afford one of the most interesting trips to be found in Southern Italy. This picture shows some of the beautiful water effects.

"HEMP GROWING" (New Zealand), (Pathe), July 28.—On the same reel with "The Straits of Bonifacio." An interesting picture portraying one of the most important industries of New Zealand.

"THE MAN WITH THE GLOVE" (Kalem), July 28.—This is a photoplay the theme of which involves in the plot the hazing of a new college student. Clyde Penfield (Guy Coombs) during the foolish ceremonies is branded on the back of his left hand with the word "coward." Humiliated, he vows vengeance on the perpetrators. He is forced to wear a glove. Later, through good heartedness, he alleviates the suffering of his former persecutor's family, by ministering to the welfare of his wife and child. There is a intensified interest in this offering and it is meritorious.

"MUFF" (Selig), July 28.—This is a story of a father's reformation written by Roy L. McArdell and filled with a lot of impossible complications which are claimed to work out into a great moral. An unscrupulous husband, a baby, an old maid and various other characters make up the cast. It is very conventional in theme. The direction, acting and photography are adequate. It seems to please.

"THE QUESTION AND ANSWER MAN" (Lubin), July 28.—A good story of the editorial room, caused by a mix-up of proper names and nom de plumes, featuring Lottie Briscoe and Arthur Johnson, supported by a good cast in every respect. The photography and acting are up to the standard and it can be recommended as a good release.

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 14, July 29.—The Grand Prix automobile race is the most interesting item in this week's number. It is all good.

"OFFICER KATE" (Vitagraph), July 29.—Written by William Addison Lathrop and produced by Ned Finley. Officer Kate is played by Kate Price and her husband is Dan Crimmins. There are many scenes which are supposed to be really funny, but are more ridiculous than comical. In the end, through jealousy, Kate is convinced that her place is at home. A fair offering.

"SOMETHING TO A DOOR" (Edison), July 29.—This comedy is written by Mark Swan and is a real one and has been ably directed by C. J. Williams. Elsie MacLeod, William Wadsworth, Arthur Housman, Carlton King and several others make of this picture production a hilarious comedy, which kept the audience in uproarious laughter.

"THE FABLE OF THE COMING CHAMPION WHO WAS DELAYED" (Essanay), July 29.—By George Ade, which will be enjoyed by every person who attends motion picture theaters. It is a master conception and illustrates the difference between bombastic ideas and indifference. This picture is worth the price of admission to any theater where it is advertised regardless of the other attractions. The theme of the plot is a prize fight and the termination is a surprise all around. The whole thing is a laugh from start to finish.

"THE GREATER MOTIVE" (Vitagraph), July 30.—The author of this is Viola Burhans and it is directed by Theodore Marston. George Cooper, James Morrison and Dorothy Kelly have the leading roles. There is a love theme that is interesting, and a sacrifice on the part of the leading characters that gets over with gripping interest. The photography and acting are both first class.

"SNAKEVILLE'S HOME GUARD" (Essanay), July 30.—A ridiculous, but at that, a funny picture, located in Snakeville. Slim organizes a regiment to protect the town from the Mexicans and persuades Pete to join. There is much action of a fulsome nature, but Slim makes good in a wondrous manner and wins the girl in the end.

"PRIVATE BUNNY" (Vitagraph), July 31.—Written by William A. Thoden and directed by George D. Baker. Bunny is in love with his employer's daughter Flora, but when Ezra Wilson returns from the city in a brand new subway guard uniform, Flora is carried away with him and gives Bunny the cold shoulder. He goes to the city and becomes a recruit, but it is not all as represented and he deserts and goes back to the village and makes a sensation. The sergeant arrives and arrests him as a deserter, taking him away to break stones. Even the most sober-minded person would have to laugh at this picture.

"THE DEADLY BATTLE AT HICKSVILLE" (Kalem), July 31.—Featuring Ruth Roland in a Marshal Nielan comedy. There are some incidents in this photoplay which, while they are absurd, cause some merriment. Dick and Jim are rivals for the hand of Dolly, and when the war breaks out one fights for the North and the other for the South. After quite a few adventures, the war being over, they return to find Dolly has married another man. Photography and acting are good.

"WHEN THE COOK FELL ILL" (Selig), July 31.—This is one of B. M. Bower's great western comedies. It features Frank Clark, Wheeler Oakman and Tom Mix. Patsey, the cook, gives the boys so much canned corn they kick against it, and the cook eats such quantities that he is taken sick. There is the usual long ride for a doctor and a hard time getting the doctor back to the camp, for he has been imbibing too freely. When they get to the camp they find the cook in the same condition. Next day they are hoisted on a water wagon. A fair offering.

"WITHIN THE NOOSE" (Lubin), July 31.—This is written by William M. Ritchey. The leading characters in the cast are L. C. Shumway, Tom Forman and Dolly Larkin. This is a western story embracing cowboys, horseback rides, etc. Considerable exciting incidents obtain. The Vigilantes are introduced and in the finale capture the outlaws. The closing scene might have been cut out to advantage.

"FARMER RODNEY'S DAUGHTER" (Edison), August 1.—While this is an old theme the photography which pertains is beautiful and takes one back to the old farm days. The selection of scenes are admirable, and the director, Richard Ridgely, must be complimented. The cast, which includes Mabel Trunnelle, Bigelow Cooper, Yale Benner, Anne Leonard, Allen Crolius and Herbert Prior, could not be excelled. Through the influence of a little child consequent happenings occur and the family once estranged are reunited.

"THE LAD FROM OLD IRELAND" (Kalem), August 1.—A reissue of the film entitled "A Romance of Old Erin." Released November 23, 1910, and was considered one of the best of those days and worthy of a reproduction and presentation now. As remembered the plot concerns an Irish lad who arrives in America and, through vigorous efforts, he is enabled to avert the cruel landlord. Gene Gauntier plays the leading character in a finished manner and the picture will compare favorably with other productions.

"THE SQUATTER'S GAL" (Essanay), August 1.—Featuring G. M. Anderson (Broncho Billy). Learning that a squatter has located on his land, he personally proceeds to order him to vacate. He meets the squatter's daughter who so attracts him that he rescues her and her father from trouble and eventually marries the "gal."

"THE MAN WHO PAID" (Biograph), August 1.—A conventional and long-drawn-out story of anguish that has no real motive or moral. The photography, direction and acting is up to the Biograph standard.

"SHE GAVE HIM A ROSE" (Lubin), August 1.—On the same reel with "The Rise of the Johnsons." Written by John A. Murphy. An episode concerning two lovers who inadvertently get mixed up "very much" with two burglars. The ardent pair of sweethearts eventually win out in good shape.

"THE RISE OF THE JOHNSONS" (Lubin), August 1.—On the same reel with "She Gave Him a Rose," and written by the same author. John and Mattie Edwards and Babe Hardy have the leading roles and make of this a laughable and entertaining comedy. The incidents which occur in the various scenes kept the audience laughing heartily.

"LOVE VS. PRIDE" (Selig), August 1.—The story contains a powerful lesson to those who have ambitions, and it is really worth the paying of the price. Its action is not so awfully pleasant to view, but the results depicted may prove valuable to the unsophisticated. The photography and acting were very good.

"DETECTIVE AND MATCHMAKER" (Vitagraph), August 3.—This is a picture-play in which a horse plays the leading part, his name is "Intellect," and he certainly lives up to the caption. He seems to be imbued with more than horse-sense and is the best actor in the cast. He foils the villain, protects the heroine and finally straightens things out to suit himself. This is some horse play.

"IN AND OUT" (Essanay), August 3.—An old-fashioned, slap-bang comedy, featuring a couple of German comedians, who are street musicians. It is ridiculous in theme but gets many laughs. It will please in the majority of houses.

"A TANGO SPREE" (Edison), August 3.—There is a laughter producing element in this comedy. An old crank who is opposed to the tango and all other dances, because he does not approve of them, attempts to taboo what he considers the obnoxious steps. He succeeds in getting rather roughly handled by the other inhabitants of the town who object to his censorship and is finally won over and does the tango with his dear old mother-in-law.

"A MEAL TICKET" (Biograph), August 3.—A comedy containing quite a number of funny situations. It is well photographed, directed and acted.

"PICTURESQUE GAGRY" (Pathe), August 4.—Gagry is a beautiful resort on the coast in Southern Russia. This perfectly photographed scenic and topical gives some lovely views of the place and its environs.

"RUSSIAN ZOO" (Pathe) August 4.—On the same reel with Gagry views is this series that will surely interest. It shows some strange and outlandish animal. Is well photographed and full of instruction.

"TRAINING ARMY DOGS" (Pathe), Augut 4.—Dogs are always interesting to the general spectator. These are Airedale terriers and very well trained animals. The offering should prove acceptable.

"BASQUE WEDDING" (Pathe), August 4.—No one knows to what race the Basque people belong or how it was that they got their place in Europe. They live in the Pyrenees between France and Spain. They are all noblemen; for once in the Middle Ages when they come to the rescue of a Spanish king he enobled the whole tribe by way of reward. This picture of their marriage customs is, we think, an especially worthy offering. It is clearly photographed.

Licensed Special

"THE IDENTIFICATION" (Kalem), July 27.—J. P. McGowan produces this two-part picture. He also plays the part of Selwyn, a slave of drugs. It is a strong impersonation. Helen Holmes plays the opposite role—her work is interesting. The picture is well made. There are thrilling situations, the escape from prison being especially so. There are splendid exteriors of the South. If the subject as a whole is not over pleasant, there can be no question as to its dramatic quality.

"JOHN RANCE, GENTLEMAN" (Vitagraph), July 28.—This two-part picture is very commendable in all respects. The author is Elizabeth R. Carpenter and the director, Van Dyke Brooke, has ably produced it. Norma Talmadge, Antonio Moreno and Harry Kendall have the leading roles. The theme of the plot is full of heart interest and illustrates that even when a man is tempted by a woman whom he dearly loves he remains faithful to his friend. Mr. Moreno makes of John Rance a noble character. This is a superior number.

"THE INDIAN AGENT" (Kalem), July 29.—This two-part picture-play features Princess Mona Darkfeather, and while it is intense in plot and interesting in theme, it contains inconsistencies. The photography, scenes and acting are surely adequate, especially where the hunger-maddened Indians attack the whites. This is an entertaining number.

"THE MOTHER HEART" (Selig), July 29.—Bessie Eyton and Wheeler Oakman are the principals in this two-part picture play in which hypocrisy is the theme of the plot. A wealthy society girl who rebels against the methods of the idle rich finally finds peace and happiness in the simpler life. This is a very well produced story in every way. The photography and acting on the part of all are up to the standard.

"THE LURE OF THE CAR WHEELS" (Lubin), July 29.—This two-part plot contains much that is intense and interesting. It illustrates the strange adventures of a boy imbued with a mania for wanderlust. Many scenes are shown where he takes his chances in and under freight cars. Finally he arrives in the west, where he locates, makes good, and receives the nomination for mayor of the town. A love affair obtains, in which his sweetheart forsakes him and he turns again to the lure of the wheels. This production is worth the viewing.

"A BIT OF HUMAN DRIFTWOOD" (Biograph), July 30.—This two-part photoplay contains much that is interesting and demonstrates the inborn strength of the woman. There is much heart interest and in the end the man is compelled to realize the indiscretion of his youth. A well made picture in every respect, with not a very pleasant ending.

"THREE MEN AND A WOMAN" (Lubin), July 30.—By George Terwilliger, author and producer. This is a sensational melodrama and the entire company was sent to St. Augustine, Florida, to produce it. Some of the most daring scenes put into photoplay are involved in this plot. Anna Luther, Kempton Greene, Earl Metcalf and the entire cast are certainly expert swimmers. This offering is full of thrills and will certainly make good on any program.

"THE STUFF THAT DREAMS ARE MADE OF" (Edison), July 31.—A new version of the celebrated Edison comedy in two parts, directed by Charles H. France. The leading characters are played by Gladys Hulette, Harry Eytinge, Cora Williams, Richard Tucker, Gertrude McCoy and William Bechtel. Nellie woke up and discovered that the mortgage had been renewed on their home and that she and Joe would not have to work for their living after all. A superior comedy, well produced and out of the ordinary run of pictureplays.

"THE SEVENTH PRELUDE" (Essanay), July 31.—This two-part photoplay, written by Lillian Bennet-Thompson, is an unusually interesting detective story, but reminds one somewhat of Sherlock Holmes and his pal, Dr. Watson. A wealthy man is shot while playing Chopin's "Seventh Prelude" and it keeps one guessing as to who fired the shot. A detective examines the Warren mansion and after a desperate struggle, catches the culprit. It holds the attention of the audience all through. The photography is very clear throughout, both the interior and exterior scenes. The acting is beyond criticism.

"THE VIOLIN OF 'M'SIEUR" (Vitagraph), August 1.—This has been reviewed at length in the Moving Picture World, and appeared at the Vitagraph Theater, Broadway, New York City, seventy-five times, where it made a great hit.

"ETIENNE OF THE GLAD HEART" (Selig), August 3.—A two-reel romance of the Northwest. Bessie Eyton and Wheeler Oakman play the leading characters. There is much intensity in the plot of this pictureplay, which has been finely directed. The acting is superb. It holds the interest of the audience strongly. The scenes in the North woods are beautifully photographed. This is a production well worth seeing.

"THE VAMPIRE'S TRAIL" (Kalem), August 3.—A two-part feature of the Alice Joyce series. Alice Hollister, Tom Moore, Robert Walker and Harry Milarde are in the cast supporting Miss Joyce. There are many complications in the plot which are interesting. The husband, who, after erring, acknowledges his baseness, is forgiven, and happiness reigns supreme in the finale. The photography is to be commended.

Independent

"THE SHERIFF'S PRISONER" (Reliance), July 22.—A western doctor performs a transfusion of blood operation at a moment's notice in a miner's shack. The sheriff's prisoner, a gambler, who has killed the miner, gives his blood to save his victim's wife, weakened by her exertions to provide for her baby. It is not exactly a pleasant story, nor can it be called convincing, but it is pretty well put on and there is much in it that will help to make it a popular offering. The photography is clear and the backgrounds well chosen.

"THOSE HAPPY DAYS" (Keystone), July 23.—Farce that will make laughter, though there have been pictures by this company that have been richer in comic incident and snappier in their business. The cops try to get a lifeboat out through the surf and it is as funny as can be toward the end of the reel.

"THE GREAT TOE MYSTERY" (Keystone), July 25.—This farce opens at a shoe store at which a sissy boy clerk falls in love with a pretty girl whose great toe is seen modestly coming out of the toe of her stocking. Her husband objects and when Willy calls there are doings at the house, up and down the stairs and up and down the dumb-waiter. It is sure to make 'em laugh. The cops appear.

"SOLDIERS OF MISFORTUNE" (Keystone), July 27.—A farce burlesque of a somewhat different type from usual. It fits Charles Murray, the comically officious lieutenant, to a tee and his playing keeps it a laugh-maker. There is sure to be laughter long and loud at most of it.

"ALL ON ACCOUNT OF A JUG" (American), July 31.—A farce that will prove diverting to a good many. Hen-pecked Heine has written his farewell note; but just before he jumps in he sees a friend with a jug and gets from it Dutch courage to wait awhile. The constable finds the note; Mrs. Heinie is appraised of the suicide and there's a great dragging of the creek until the two soaks are discovered asleep in a row boat. It is pretty well acted; has some rough business and is clearly photographed.

"THE TARGET OF DESTINY" (Princess), July 31.—Very pretty scenes around some country village give a pleasing tone to this picture; but the story is not strongly worked out. That attempt on the part of the rich youth's father to buy off the pretty country girl is nothing less than trite, too trite for a place in any carefully-written offering at the present time. And this is not the only thin bit of business in the production. On the other hand there is many a delightful bit of posing in it and the loveliest of backgrounds. Truly it is a gem of photography.

"BILL TAKES A LADY TO LUNCH" (Komic), August 2.—This is the third of the "Bill" series, and makes a good offering. Some time ago E. S. Kiser of Chicago wrote a series of office boy sonnets that were widely liked and highly praised. This picture series has much of the same atmosphere as the sonnets. The humanity in them, perhaps a bit twisted for the sake of the fun, is the thing in them that makes them go. The players are perfectly chosen. Tod Browning, as all will remember, is the boss. Fay Tincher is the stenog and Tammany Young the office boy Bill.

"THE BUTTERFLY BUG" (Thanhouser), August 2.—Professor Notty, the "butterfly bug," has a hard time finding a quiet place in his home in which to classify his collection of butterflies. This situation has been used a few times already and is also rather slight. There is little substance to this offering.

"OUR MUTUAL GIRL," Series No. 29 (Reliance), August 3.—In this number Margaret leaves Long Beach for New York, where she visits the Waldorf-Astoria. Pictures of the famous Rubenstein club are shown and Sousa's band leading the march to dinner. Later she rides with Lieutenant Porte in a hydroaeroplane. An interesting number.

"A RACE FOR LIFE" (Sterling), August 3.—A "kid" story, with Little Billy and his pals in the cast. The girl is abducted by the boy villain and the miniature engine bears down upon her as she lies tied to the railroad tracks. This gets up quite a little suspense, even though of a burlesque nature. The whole experience turns out to be Billy's dream. A good number enacted entirely by children.

"A SUSPENDED CEREMONY" (Beauty), August 4.—This is a good light comedy number, in which Kathie Fischer plays the mischievous lad. Harry Pollard and Marguerita Fischer are the lovers. The attempted wedding in the boat made a novel scene and the situations, as a whole, are amusing.

"UNIVERSAL IKE'S LEGACY" (Universal Ike), August 4.—This low comedy number shows Ike and his sweetheart, together with the goat and the old folks at a hotel. The fun is of the broad sort, such as the goat nibbling at the old man's whiskers. A fire breaks out and there is a chase over the roof tops. This is funny in spots.

"IZZY AND HIS RIVAL" (Reliance), August 5.—Both Izzy and his rival must get a thousand dollars and the first one in will have the girl. Izzy almost gets the better of his rival; but the rival has him arrested and so he loses out. It is comical and will surely make laughter. We count it a serviceable offering.

"THE WIDOW" (American), August 5.—The story told by this picture is a bit too trite and sentimental to hold with marked strength; it fails to convince. Yet there are some very prettily posed scenes in it and the photography is clear.

"A DRAMATIC MISTAKE" (Sterling), August 6.—This is a typical Ford Sterling number, with the comedian in the part of Virginius. His performance is interrupted by the police and there is a grand scramble on all hands. A lot of fun in this of the rough-house sort and it will bring many laughs.

"HER DUTY" (Princess), August 7.—An open and shut melodrama of pronounced type. The gallery will, no doubt, like it much; for it has the good situations. To the rest of the audience it will be delightful as unconscious comedy; for it is such a rich specimen of its kind.

"ON THE BORDER" (Reliance), August 7.—Irene Hunt and Eugene Palette play the leads in this love affair between a Mexican dancer and an American soldier. The makeups are good, likewise the atmosphere and settings, but the melodramatic plot lacks the sense of passionate reality necessary to make it a complete success. A fairly strong offering.

"RINGING THE CHANGES" (Royal), August 8.—A farce that is quite rough. A rich old aunt is belabored by her big nephew who has found his sister's beau dressed, on purpose, just as the woman is. He runs in a door just as the aunt runs out and the nephew of the rich aunt doesn't know that he is ruining his own prospects. The reviewer found no amusement in it; but these farces give pleasure only to those in the right mood for them. We would count it a gamble for any audience.

"MISS GALISPYE'S VACATION" (Royal), August 8.—On the same reel is this farce of a somewhat different kind. It seems to us rather dry; surely it isn't convincing. Miss Galispye is a very pretty actress, and when she arrives in town all the men folks are at her feet. It is hardly probable that they all would be at her feet at the same instant though.

"A TELL-TALE SCAR" (Thanhouser), August 9.—A first-class offering with a thrilling hand-to-hand struggle at the close. Pietro, the barber, recognizes his customer as a badly-wanted individual, follows him to his den and attacks him single-handed. The struggle scene arouses considerable suspense and is well staged.

"MOONLIGHT" (Eclair), August 9.—This picture illustrates how an ignorant, domineering old father is conquered by love scenes which he views in the moonlight between his son and his sweetheart. There are come incongruities, but the photokraphy in this picture and tinting are extraordinary.

"A FRONTIER ROMANCE" (Frontier), August 9.—This story gets a good start, of an original nature, but at the close becomes conventional. The calling up of scenes in the girl's life by means of a calendar was a pleasing touch and the observer becomes quite interested in her. The cast is a pleasing one, with Dolly Larkin, Joe Franz and Arthur Allardt in the leads. The photography is very good in places and below the standard in others.

"SIMPLE FAITH" (Victor), August 10.—This film story tells of the rivalry of two young fishermen over a girl. One cuts the other's nets so that he fails to make a haul and thus loses the girl temporarily. The religious feature of the disciples in a boat came too much as a surprise. Something of the kind should have been suggested earlier in the story to give it proper weight. The close seemed somewhat oversentimental.

"SUSANNA'S NEW SUIT" (Beauty), August 11.—There is enough to this offering's situation to make it substantially amusing. Especially good is the ending, in which Susanna (Marguerita Fisher), comes home to her husband (Harry Pollard)—they have had a quarrel over the price of a suit—and he thinks that she has been killed in a train wreck on her way to mother's—and is tattered and torn from a bargain sale. The picture is quite sure to excite laughter and makes a serviceable and likable offering.

"SOME CROOKS" (Crystal), August 11.—Vivian Prescott has the lead in a short comedy not notable for spontaneous humor.

"WILLIE'S DISGUISE" (Crystal), August 11.—On the same reel as the foregoing. The leads are played by Pearl White and Chester Barnett.

"HER TWIN BROTHER" (Joker), August 12.—In this comedy of summer foolery Bess Meredyth, in trousers or in skirt, makes fun.

"AT THREE O'CLOCK" (Sterling), August 13.—In this number Ford Sterling appears at his best. He determines to die because of a girl and arranges with Profs. A. Sassin and M. Balmer for his death at three o'clock. Later he changes his mind and there is the usual wild chase. This contains a lot of funny situations.

"THE IDIOT" (Majestic), August 4.—A good piece of character work is accomplished by Robert Harron in this offering. He appears as an idiot boy who saves his mother from a burning house and later goes for his pet bird only to meet with a fatal end. The story is well worked out and has a pathetic close of genuine appeal.

"IN PERIL'S PATH" (Thanhouser), August 14.—This is a very enjoyable small-town story. The country politician succeeds in becoming appointed postmaster in place of the widow who had succeeded her husband to that office. But the widow's small boy saves him as he lies intoxicated before an approaching train, so he refuses to take the postoffice. A simple, appealing plot, well photographed and nicely presented throughout.

"THE BARNSTORMERS" (Powers), August 14.—A hard-up troupe persuades a country landlord that his son can act and then takes the two along to the next stop. It is the ruse of the ingenue to get the troupe out of a tight place. The show in which the son "acts" is given and we see how the people take to it. The scheme is worked so that the old man loses both ways and, as his wife won't send money, he and son walk home on the tracks. The burlesque characters are fair and will make laughter; but there is nothing especially noteworthy in the offering one way or the other. The staging, and all that, is fair.

"PASS KEY NO. 2" (Joker), August 14.—A burlesque farce that tears passion to shreds for sake of the laugh. The scheme is very slight, but it is full of rough happenings and will make many laughs. Fair, but not up to the best of its kind.

"WHAT HAPPENED TO SCHULTZ" (Joker), August 15.—A rough offering that will go well. It is both fresh and broad, and, if not wholly elegant, is the kind of stuff that is in demand just now with the many. It shows how Schultz is cured of the D. T.'s; but this is done in a new way and is cleverly acted.

Independent Specials

"MABLE'S NEW JOB" (Keystone), July 16.—A two-reeler full of the lively and breezy quality of this studio's usual output. All of it is laughable, if not new, and Mabel Normand is as comical as usual, which means that there is a good deal of real fun in it; she is better far than any other player in it. At the ending episode of the second reel, when the cops get busy and things begin to happen, the picture becomes truly laughable. Of course, it is not elegant, this rough and tumble business.

"THE LONG FEUD" (Broncho), July 29.—This two-part photoplay is a conventional moonshine story. Innumerable forest scenes are produced which are good to look at. The plot embraces a feud between two families and the old theme of the son of one and the daughter of the other family falling in love. However, it is interesting.

"THE CRUISE OF CASTE" (Domino), July 30.—This two-part picture play contains some of the most beautiful scenes imaginable, but the story is full of anguish and has a tragic ending. A lower caste Japanese girl marries a man of caste, who is ordered home. The wife commits suicide to free him to return. There is real emotional interest in this picture.

"AN ELEVENTH HOUR REFORMATION" (Kay Bee), July 31.—A two-part photoplay, written by Thomas H. Ince and Richard V. Spencer. Walter Edwards is the director. Gretchen Lederer is featured. It is a rather unpleasant story of marital infelicity of a conventional order, although there are some intense and interesting scenes which are well made.

"THE GUNMAN" (Reliance), August 1.—A two-reel western from the story of George Patullo with action enough to make it a good attention holder. The acting and staging are the things that differentiate it from the early type of pictures of western life. The dishonest foreman tries to get the young cowboy, who loves his daughter, convicted of stealing the missing cattle. When the gunman finds him out, he makes a bargain with him and destroys the evidence on condition that he let the young people get married. This is rather weak on morality.

"THE PROPERTY MAN" (Keystone), August 1.—A two-reel picture of the funny things that happened behind the scenes in a vaudeville theater. There are very few people who don't like these Keystones. They are thoroughly vulgar and touch the homely strings of our own vulgarity. Some of the funniest things in this picture are vulgar—they are too vulgar to describe; but are too funny to pass for vulgarity when only seen. They are not the best pictures for a parlor entertainment, that is true. There is some brutality in this picture and we can't help feeling that this is reprehensible. What human being can see an old man kicked in the face and count it fun?

"MOONSHINE MOLLY" (Majestic), August 2.—The story of this two-part offering is sensational rather than deeply human, although it has a tense enough, though rather elemental situation at its climax. The author is H. Durant, and Christie Cabanne put it on. The titular role is taken by Mae Marsh, who is not quite so sure in her portrayal as usual, not on account of limited imagination but from lack of human experience not astonishing in one of her years. For instance, she puts a touch to Miss Tichner's kind of work in it at one place and one can catch several changes of tone in Molly that spoil her consistency. Robert Harron, in the role of Jud, is more satisfactory. The work of Miss Marsh, of Mr. Harron and of the supporting players makes it a good offering.

"THE WILES OF A WOMAN" (Thanhouser), August 3.—This is No. 8 in the Million Dollar Mystery series. The incident is not self contained and is left "in the air." Yet none can deny that the two reels interest. This reviewer knows nothing about the story, as a whole, and sees no reason why what is shown here should have a part in any story of a million dollars. None such will find in this part any reason why he should come to see the rest of it. It is, of course, finely acted and the photography is about perfect.

"AT THE END OF A PERFECT DAY" (American), August 3.—A two-part offering telling a sentimental story of great improbability. Very simple minds might take much pleasure in it; but no honest reviewer can command it as being at all like human life or as being an interesting offering for discriminating patrons.

"THE GUIDING HAND" (Thanhouser), August 4.—A two-part offering that tells a pretty story and would have been a strong release in one reel. At the end the blind girl has her sight restored, as is usual in these stories. She is sent, an orphan, to her uncle whose family is walking in dangerous places and brings love and light to them. This is very pretty, but to have her marry the rake of a son seems hardly convincing. One thing it is very strong on, and that is photography—some of its scenes are nothing less than lovely. It will be liked for its good things.

"WHEN THE HEART CALLS" (Imp), August 6.—A two-reel number, with Wm. E. Shay, Mrs. Walker and Violet Mersereau in the cast. Billy marries a chorus girl against his father's wishes, is disinherited and they go to a farm. Six years later the father becomes reconciled, after saving his two grandchildren from drowning. A most obvious plot, but handled so attractively that it appeals. The country scenes, including the corn field, daisy field, swimming pool, etc., are pleasing. Just pretty freshening up of an old theme.

"THE GANGSTERS AND THE GIRL" (Key Bee), August 7.—A two-part picture play introducing the denizens of the slums. There is a love theme running through the plot which is not intensely interesting. The photography and direction seems to be the best part of the picture. Many exciting scenes occur, such as they are.

"THE COAST GUARD'S BRIDE" (Victor), August 7.—A two-reel number, with Irene Wallace and Walter Miller in the leads. The lonely wife on the island puts a message in a bottle and afterward goes away with the man who found it. He takes her to a fast house, from which her husband rescues her just in time. The old hermit who was introduced in several scenes for some reason drops out of the story. This production, as a whole, cannot be called strong; some of the photography is badly marred by static rays. The story itself is moderately entertaining.

"THE OUBLIETTE" (Bison 101), August 9.—A new series which is to follow a serial story running in the Century Magazine. It is extremely carefully staged and well-acted picture and very sure to attract attention. One of the best serial stories, judging by this first installment, that has been offered. It will make a hit in places where patrons want action and art in their pictures. We have noticed it at length. For review see page 410, issue of July 18, 1914.

"THE TRAP" (American), August 10.—A two-reel, revenue man and moonshiner's daughter melodrama. The story is not new and the revenue man, for whom the girl gives her life, is only a sneak; but there is good acting and some excellent situations that compensate for its weakness. Vivian Rich plays the girl to William Garwood's revenue man, and the best of the complete Flying A stock support them. The scenes are also commendable. A very fair picture.

"IN ALL THINGS MODERATION" (Imp), August 10.—This two-reel offering gets hold of elemental passions and stirs the observer, not always pleasantly, but in a beneficial way. It demonstrates how a puritanical father is finally made more human and less fanatical in his religious beliefs. This only happens after his wife dies and one of his daughters and her drunken husband meet with a tragic end. There have been many stern parents just like the one Howard Crampton pictures, whose very narrowness defeats their own desire for good. Alexander Gaden, Dorothy Phillips and Ruth Donnelly are also in the cast. This is a strong offering.

"THE PRICE PAID" (Eclair), August 12.—A two-part story of how a contractor, a city political boss, artfully gets a would-be honest commissioner of the public water supply to take ten thousand dollars and let him get a big contract. When the water supply becomes contaminated the children of both catch the disease and the boss's daughter dies. The story is plainly striving to put a lesson in its message and this lessens its interest. It is weak, though the staging and photography are good.

"SHORTY AND THE FORTUNE TELLER (Broncho), August 12.—A desirable two-part farce of wild west days. It has some rich comedy in it and it is, almost all, fresh and amusing. Shorty, with his fortune told, gets the swell head and acts like a lord on the ranch. What his sweetheart, Gussie the Swedish cook, does to him makes the first hearty laugh. Then the action becomes excruciatingly funny when things begin to happen in a way just as foretold. He does win much gold (Gussie had already given him his title), becomes as drunk as a lord and, being drunk, saves a beautiful lady from danger. It is a well-constructed and convincingly funny picture and makes an excellent offering. T. H. Ince put in on from C. G. Sullivan's script.

"A ROMANCE OF THE SAWDUST" (Domino), August 13.—A circus life story and a melodramatic romance that makes a reliable and effective offering that is sure to give entertainment to and please the many. The situation is not new; but it winds up a tangle in a very acceptable way and then uses many excellently handled and thrilling happenings in straightening it out. The villain, for vengeance, lets loose the wild animals, a lion, a tiger and leopards, and they stir things up well. All this is put on with skill and pictured by perfect photography. A good offering.

"THE STIGMA" (Kay-Bee), August 14.—A picture of a woman who, because her husband, a doctor, is too busy to pamper her, ruins three lives. This subject matter is not highly inspiriting; but, perhaps it is used to permit a reconciliation in Alaska winter scenes after the actor, who is the cause of the breaking up of the home and whom the doctor had caught and branded on the face, dies. It is only a fair, average offering, acceptable because it is like better pictures and because there is good acting and photography in it.

"IN THE LION'S JAWS" (Box Office Attractions).—Telling a story of passion and made in Germany, this three-reel offering, which is very well acted if not wholly convincing as to its lesser incidents, should be very acceptable in most places. It is sensational and will surely hold attention on account of the passion in it, if for no other reason. The staging will be liked and there are many fine scenes and backgrounds. The feature in it is the narrow escape of a man from a den of hungry lions into which he descends before a motion picture camera. His predicament is contrived by the story's villainess, because she loves him and knows that he is in love with the pretty movie ingenue. Some interesting scenes in a German motion picture studio are included. The photography is excellent.

"THE SILVER LINING" (Balboa—Box Office Attractions).—There are two distinct stories told by this three-reel Balboa picture. The first is the story of a fisherman's daughter whom a rich man marries under an assumed name and then deserts, and the second is the story of her daughter after the mother's death. This second part, which fills the third reel, is much better than the first part of two reels' length. They both show a knowledge of what has been and is popular; but particularly in the first story one sees too many places where hurried direction has quite distroyed the illusion of reality. It is well photographed and will hold attention as well as give entertainment to the many; but no one will admire it as a strong work of art. It is a weak production, but a fair offering.

"COLONEL HESA LIAR AS EXPLORER" (Eclectic).—The quality of these delightful pen and ink comedies is well known and we have heard exhibitors wish they could get more of them. One thing will particularly make fun in this number is the expression of the cannibal cook preparing the pot for Hesa. It is all good and full of Bab Ballad flavor.

"THE UNEXPECTED" (Box Office Attractions).—A three-part offering picturing an elemental struggle with detectives on one side and smugglers on the other and relieved by a love story with "the unexpected" ending. This ending with its touch of humor, though not at all a new expedient, gives at the close a little pleasant fun that adds to the picture's entertainment value. The film opens and closes with beautiful sunset pictures, looking out to sea; was taken on a rough mountainous shore and has some fine views of up-leaping surf. There are one or two minor breaks in the production, as the difference between the sticks the old woman takes up and those she puts down; but the story, because it is well acted and because of the little thrills in it, carries well, though not a "convincing" picture. The photography is clear and commendable.

Lillian Walker

LILLIAN WALKER, the Vitagraph motion picture star, was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., April 21, 1888. The name Walker is a combination of her own family name and a stage nom de plume, her father being Andrew Wolke, which generally has developed into Walker in English. Her mother was Caroline Petersen. Both parents were born and raised in Sweden; three generations before on the father's side having emigrated from Germany, and her mother's family being Swedish as far back as the records go.

Lillian Walker.

Miss Walker was educated in the Brooklyn Public Schools and at Erasmus Hall High School. Her first position was as a telephone operator, but upon the death of her father it developed on her to become the main support of the family, so she cast about for a more profitable employment. At first she worked as a professional model, and as such gained sufficient local reputation to secure her first theatrical engagement, which was the ingenue part in the melodrama called "The Little Organ Grinder," in which Maurice Costello, the famous Vitagraph Player, was the leading man, and Mrs. Mary Maurice, also of the Vitagraph Company, was the old lady. It was a one-night stand organization in which the work was exceptionally hard.

When Miss Walker returned to New York she secured an engagement with the "Follies of 1910." in which she was the end dancer and did specialties throughout the performance. Preferring to remain in New York she again adopted the calling of a model and while thus employed, many of her photographs were seen by Commodore J. Stuart Blackton, one of the Vitagraph owners. Her photographs made her look possible for motion pictures and she was given a try-out with absolutely wonderful results, inasmuch as blondes with light eyes have an exceptionally hard task before them to succeed in motion pictures. Miss Walker's first picture was in a drama called "The Inherited Taint," in which she played the leading part opposite Mr. Costello. Her ability as a comedienne was soon established and since then she has generally appeared in the lighter form of motion pictures, her greatest success being in "Cinderella's Slippers," "The Wonderful Statue," 'Love's Quarantine," and in the series of pictures in which she was known as Miss Tomboy, the greatest of these pictures being "Love, Luck and Gasoline," a three-reel comedy.

Throughout the civilized world Miss Walker's nick-name is "Dimples." She is an excellent swimmer, a good rider and has made many trips in aeroplanes. Miss Walker has never appeared in motion pictures for any concern other than the Vitagraph Company of America.

The War and the Pictures

Many Continental Factories Already Closed—American Makers May Profit Largely by this Calamity.

THE suddenness with which the war cloud rose and burst in Europe centers all attention on the main event at the outset. The immediate effects of war on the moving picture industry at first escaped the attention of nearly every one interested. Then when the great money centers of the world were rocked by the convulsion and the leading national stock exchanges were closed to prevent the sacrifice of securities that were considered gilt-edged in time of peace, every man of business began to ponder carefully how his prospects might be affected.

American film manufacturers are very happily situated as compared with their European brethren. They have the entire home market unimpaired. Indeed, the home demands for their product will be greater than ever, because the importations of films from abroad will be reduced to only a small fraction of their former volume.

Countering this advantage, though not overbalancing it, will be the reduction in the foreign demand for the American product. The Continental demand will be almost nil. This condition works advantageously for the American maker, who will find an increasing demand in England and other continental countries with which our relations are not entirely interrupted.

This statement is borne out by advices from a number of the French factories which indicate that very little will be done in the way of production for some time to come. It is believed that Italian producers will be able to continue producing unless Italy should find it impossible to maintain neutrality. In case Italy is forced into the fight the big producers in that country will have to suspend production. In Germany, of course, everything is at a standstill and will be until the issues are decided.

Owing to the fact that the greater part of the World's market has been supplied from London and that communications between that point and other countries will be seriously impaired arrangements are being made to supply American pictures direct. Australian buyers, though already getting many of their American pictures by way of San Francisco and Vancouver, are perfecting arrangements to get more by those routes. Undoubtedly some other arrangements than those now existing will have to be made in the case of South Africa.

Attention of American producers is directed to the South American market which will be seriously affected by the suspension of the Continental companies. Here is a field that has never been cultivated by American producers, mainly for the reason that the South Americans were not interested in the class of pictures made here. It is just possible that the failure of the customary supply may induce our South American neighbors to consider our product. It would not be a bad idea for American producers to study the requirements in those countries and make an attempt to introduce their pictures.

We append some expressions regarding the situation from a number of manufacturers and importers which will be of interest:

Eclair Company.

Claude Patin, the secretary of the Eclair Company, said that the war had given his company considerable concern. In the first place, Charles Jourjon, the president of the company, was already in the field, as was also Albert Vandal, one of the largest stockholders of the corporation and the head of the technical departments as well as the general director of the company in the absence of Mr. Jourjon. Mr. Patin, as an officer of the French army, is himself awaiting the notification of the French Consul at New York as to his day of departure to join the colors. Secretary Patin said that up to Wednesday he had received from Paris little definite information as to the situation there. He said all the managers in Berlin, Vienna and Belgrade had been called back to Paris, but he was in doubt as to how they would reach the French capital. The Eclair offices in Paris are still open, with a much reduced force, while the factory is closed. Every able-bodied man under forty-five years of age has been called.

While the Paris studio has been closed, Mr. Patin pointed out that there are on hand there sufficient negatives to supply American demands for at least eight months, and that undoubtedly there would not be much difficulty in getting that to this country, if not directly, at least by way of England. These subjects range from single to five reels in length. "Our American branch is going to continue business as usual," continued Mr. Patin. "It is our intention to increase the American product to such an extent as to balance the absence of output in France. We have studios in London and Berlin, which may discontinue production, and one in Italy, which undoubtedly will continue. To all offices still open we will ship direct where possible—to Italy, St. Petersburg and London, for example."

Universal Company.

Joe Brandt, speaking for President Laemmle, at the office of the Universal Company, said he did not believe the war would materially affect the product of his concern. In the first place, he did not believe the English market would be seriously disturbed, and Great Britain, he said, was the big factor. He estimated that the sales of American film in the British Isles would on the average about double the sales on the entire Continent. Mr. Brandt pointed out that in France and Germany practically all the men employed in the cinema business will be liable for military duty and that it will follow that the taking of these men from their employment will in many cases close theaters and studios. He added that quite a number of men employed in the laboratories of the Universal will be called abroad. Among these are the superintendent of laboratories, Mr. Barletier, who came to this country with Mr. Brenon on his return from Europe and later filmed "Neptune's Daughter"; his technical knowledge, however, was so marked that he was taken from the camera and placed in an executive position.

Vitagraph Company.

Albert E. Smith, of the Vitagraph Company, said that the Paris factory of his company had been closed, as the entire force had been drawn to the colors. Roland A. Reader is in charge of the Paris office. The English trade of the Vitagraph Company will be taken care of through the office in London, in which city it has established a factory for printing. Mr. Smith said the information reaching his company was to the effect that practically all of the studios in Europe had been closed.

Kalem Company.

William Wright, vice-president of the Kalem Company, said that, judging from the cable advices received by his company, the sales of Kalem may be increased in England by reason of the closing of the Continental studios. It was Mr. Wright's belief that, while the company would be shut out of Germany and Austria, the markets of France, Russia and Italy would not be materially disturbed. As regards conditions in Australia, Mr. Wright said the company would continue as it had been doing for a year now—shipping direct.

Pathe Company

Herbert Hoagland, manager of the Pathe establishment in Jersey City, declared that very little news had come from the other side of the water. "Of course," he said over the wire to a World man, "the studios and factories in Paris are now manned by girls—do you get that? Seriously, though, with the exception of heads of departments, men above the age limit, all our employes are reservists, and they have gone to the front. Vice-President Bonvillain, who for many months now has been here, has been called to the colors and will leave on Saturday or Tuesday. Rene Monca, one of the office force, has already gone. Vice-President Rouselle has been called. Roger Nicolet, manager of the Bound Brook factory, was in France on vacation when hostilities broke out and immediately donned his uniform. Another one of our men was on the high seas when war was declared. His vacation will be in the field fighting the battles of France. Chief Producer Gasnier is also another awaiting a call from the Consul.

"There are Pathe studios in Moscow, Berlin, Milan and London, as well as Paris. We expect to continue to get negative through in some way, from Milan or London perhaps, and from Paris we may be able to get film through Barcelona, where there is a Pathe office. We don't anticipate being materially handicapped."

Gaumont Company.

Mr. Wilde, of the Gaumont office in Fortieth street, said that his company had been unable to get much definite information as to conditions in Paris. He assumed that the studios were closed. He said there was quite a number of employes of the company at the factory in Flushing who were French reservists and were awaiting a call.

World Film Corporation.

Lewis J. Selznik, of the World Film Corporation, said that he believed so far as his company was concerned the turmoil in Europe would not be at all for the worse. He said he had received a wire from his general manager in Canada that it looked as if the company's interests would be improved by reason of the war. Mr. Selznik stated in the course of his conversation that the World Film had decided to discontinue the importation of foreign subjects and that in the future all productions marketed by the company would be of American make. He said that the action was not based on any lack of quality in the foreign product, but was simply in line with the wishes of the customers of the company.

"We are closing contracts very rapidly with theater managers," said Mr. Selznik; "in fact, we closed $200,000 worth last week. You can see that the only way the war can affect us is through the houses that have contracts with us. If conditions should get so that theaters could not make good we would be hit. We do not expect that, however. It is a fact that 90 per cent. of our product has been foreign, but after canvassing the situation we find our exhibitors prefer American. Then again, we have had so much trouble with the copyright laws—they are lax and are enforced only with difficulty. We have had our experience with pirated films, which we have been compelled to locate and seize. It is not the fault of the manufacturer. A man buys a subject for South America, as he represents, and then shoots it to the United States. As we are not exporting film at present we are relieved of apprehension on that score. Our intention is not to sell film in Europe, although we have two men over there now looking over the situation. We have quite a number of negatives on hand, which for the present we are keeping under cover. The World Film Corporation is in what you might call a beautiful position."

Apex Company.

P. P. Craft, of the Apex Film Company, said that he had hopes of getting his German productions through Rotterdam. As to his English supply Mr. Craft said that he believed that would not be materially interfered with. It was his opinion that such concerns as Cricks & Martin and the British and Colonial would continue to manufacture. He said he had a number of releases ahead, and that where during the dull season he had maintained his program he certainly would make every effort to continue doing so during the growing business of the fall season.

Great Northern.

Ingvald C. Oes, of the Great Northern Film Company, looks optimistically at the situation. The Denmark studio expects to continue to make pictures and hopes to get its product to both Americas without more than a temporary delay. It has a strong organization looking after its interests in South America, where there have been many French pictures sold, and hopes to get a good piece of the business necessarily uncared for.

Pasquali-American.

At the Pasquali Company's offices, Vice-President G. Albert Amato said the American Company has just received a cable from the home office, and while some immediate delay in getting films is looked for, no lessening of the Pasquali output or serious difficulty in shipping it to America is expected.

Warner's Features.

At Warner's Features Office this statement was given out: "Naturally the war will prevent us from obtaining our usual supply of foreign films. We have, however, booked for future release a number of carefully chosen pictures and hope that before this supply is exhausted the war will be over. In any event, the large number of American producing companies which release through us are fully competent to meet any demands made upon them. One result to be looked for is the increased demand for American offerings in Europe after the war and undoubtedly while the war lasts and for some time after we will send more American films abroad than before."

American Itala.

Harry Raver, of the American Itala Film Company, is not worrying about the supply of Itala films. He has extra prints of "Cabiria" now in customs, enough to keep up with the demand here for the masterpiece for some months. Besides this, he has a number of the ordinary Itala features already in the country and has been assured from the Italian offices of his company that he need expect no great delay in its regular service. He sees a bright prospect before American and other producers who can keep up the quality of their product, due to the breaking up of the picture service from France and Germany. For the American market alone is sufficient to give them a living and a small margin of profit, and every picture they make is good for use in the time when there will be a new demand for films in Europe. He also thought it probable that Italian and foreign makers generally will be likely to make film especially to fill the American market, since their home sales will be slight.

Mutual Film Corporation.

"This most unexpected and deplorable war, which will cost Europe millions in treasure and in men, if the present conditions are not suddenly and unexpectedly helped, is bound to bring about a general prosperity for the United States," said Mr. Aitken at the Mutual offices at 71 West 23d Street. "I believe that as soon as the trade conditions are adjusted we will see the most prosperous business this country has ever seen.

"The direct effect on the motion picture business is to cut off exporting and importing, and as soon as conditions are adjusted the increase in domestic business will more than take care of any export loss, and with importation cut off American films will be in greater demand.

"The increase in the attendance of the motion picture theaters, noticeable in times of stress, is the first evidence of the prosperity that is to come. The conditions of the business generally are healthy, and the houses and the manufacturers are ready to take care of the increased pressure. General prosperity helps any amusement business, and before the Fall this prosperity will begin to be felt in all strictly American industries."

Mr. Aitken's statement is especially significant because he is interested financially in the moving picture business in England, France, Germany and other parts of Continental Europe through the Western Import Company.

Carbons and Lenses and Film Stock.

Although there are large stocks of imported carbons and condensing lenses in the United States at the present time —possibly enough to last till the war is over—nothing of that character can be obtained until hostilities and work is again resumed in the factories. All our good carbons come from abroad, principally from Germany, likewise condensing lenses.

American lenses have not come up to the requirements of motion picture projection and the domestic brands of carbons will not burn with evenness and brilliancy in projection machines.

The Raw Film Supply Company announces that it will not solicit new business until the receipt of film stock from abroad can be guaranteed. It is understood that the works of the Berlin Aniline Works, makers of Agfa film, has suspended operations. The Raw Film Supply Company say that they have enough film on hand to enable them to take care of their old customers for a considerable period and that what they have will be used to that end.

LEVINE WANTS TO GO BACK.

H. Z. Levine, who recently returned from Europe, where he had charge of the Universal publicity and advertising, has announced that he is no longer connected with the Universal forces. Carl Laemmle has offered Mr. Levine a position with the organization here, but the latter is determined to go back to England,—after the present international war scare,—where he will establish a "buying and selling" agency. In the meantime Mr. Levine will take a vacation and while away from the metropolis will write for newspapers and periodicals on his novel experiences on the 5,000-mile "Lucille Love" tour over England, Scotland and Wales. He will also contribute a series of articles to the Moving Picture World on the English market covering advertising and selling phases.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

Judge Willis Brown in a New Role.

JUDGE WILLIS BROWN, the widely-known originator of the "Boy City" plan, intended to develop in youth sound business and moral habits, has come to the front recently in a new endeavor by serving in the capacities of scenario writer, actor and producer of a film devoted to the life story of a Russian boy, whom he has brought to a sense of law and order by means of the plan referred to.

Judge Brown established "Boy Cities" in Charlevois, Mich., and Gary, Ind., several years ago, and W. N. Selig at the time aided him in his work by devoting a reel of pictures to the operation of his plan in the former town. It proved an interesting film, and a whole page in the old Film Index was given to a review of it by me.

The Judge is now located in Salt Lake City, where he continues his adopted life work with all his former enthusiasm. One day he wrote to a cynically inclined magazine editor as follows: "If I owned a motion picture house I would show children the pleasing, helpful things of life. I would make it possible for all parents to send their children to my house, etc."

The editor took the Judge at his word and wrote in answer: "If you can write a scenario for a motion picture play that will come up to the requirements you set and still be of sufficient interest to attract patrons to a theater I would be delighted to see it—and I'm sure there are many others who would, too."

The Judge, nowise disconcerted, took the editor seriously; wrote the scenario and carried it to the man who had dared him. The latter showed it to several moving picture producers, who declared it worthy of being filmed. The result was that Judge Brown appointed one of his proteges of the Salt Lake "Boy City" to sustain the leading role, while he and other members of the company contented themselves with the subordinate parts. Judge Brown also served as director.

The other day, in the City Hall of Chicago, the five reels were viewed by the municipal board of censorship, and after several cutouts were made the films were passed.

The Chicago Herald has made arrangements by which all children in the city under 16 years of age may see it free during the next 30 days in various moving picture theaters, at special matinees. Whenever the attendance is too large for all to attend such matinees, the tickets will entitle holders to see the presentation at the regular exhibitions.

Willie Eckstein, a Russian youth, appears in the leading character of "A Boy and the Law," the title of the filmed subject. Under the firm yet gentle guidance of Judge Brown, this lad has been taught the evils of Nihilism and brought to understand the better plan of right doing and right living.

Willie accompanies the pictures wherever shown, and recites the story of his life as they are being run off. The first matinee was given at the Empire Theater, 673 West Madison street, on Saturday, August 1.

Through the arrangements made by the Chicago Herald with the owners of the play and the theater managers, it is hoped that every boy and girl in Chicago will be given an opportunity to profit by the lesson given in the pictures. This lesson is said to be no less valuable to parents, for it shows how to keep boys who are inclined to be "wild" away from bad associations and busy in ways that are beneficial.

Complimentary tickets admitting boys and girls of 16 years or under may be clipped from the Herald each day, the tickets being good only on the day they are printed.

Interesting Actions in British Court.

Two actions at law, cited by Kinematograph, in the issue of July 23, will be read with interest by film renters and exhibitors in America.

One action was brought by the Ideal Film Renting Co., of London, against the Gem Electric Theater, of Bristol. The plaintiffs claimed about $141 for films rented to the defendants; the latter made a counter-claim for $163, which included the price of the films and posters charged against them, damages for loss of prestige, the cost of new films ordered because of breach of agreement by plaintiffs, and incidental expenses.

The defendants stated that they ordered a new film, advertised as "The Morphia Slave," which was found to be exactly similar to one put on previously, called "The Shadow of Death."

The managing director of the plaintiff company said that "The Morphia Slave" had been booked by the defendants in December, and that it had been seen in many places since then and that no complaint had been made about it. On cross examination he stated that the film dated from October, 1913, and that he had no knowledge whether it and "The Shadow of Death" were the same. "The Morphia Slave" was a German film and he had the usual assurances that it was the first time it had been put on the market.

The manager of another theater testified that both the pictures mentioned had been shown at his theater and were precisely alike. In consequence, when "The Morphia Slave" was shown, several patrons demanded their money back.

The judge, in summing up, ruled that plaintiffs could only say a film was exclusive as it was supplied to them. Judgment was given the plaintiffs on both claim and counter-claim.

In the second case the Andrews' Pictures, Ltd., of London, claimed a certain amount for films supplied an exhibitor. The defendant made a counter-claim of nearly four times the amount of plaintiff's claim.

Plaintiffs failed to furnish films as agreed upon with the defendants. Certain films had been selected by the latter for their opening and they had expended a considerable sum on advertising these films in advance. In consequence of the program not being as advertised, the defendants were obliged to return admission prices to their patrons.

The court, after hearing the evidence, declared it was clear from the documents produced that there was a contract to supply two special films which defendant had advertised. The only question was as to the damage sustained by the defendant. The court awarded judgment for the plaintiffs in a sum less than was claimed, and also for the defendant in a sum about half of what was claimed for damages. Judgment with costs was entered accordingly.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Walter R. Early, who has been the popular Western manager of the New York Morning Telegraph for the past year, has resigned that position to take charge of the general management of the Consumers Film Corporation, which has general offices in Suite 1501-05, at 30 N. Michigan Boulevard. Mr. Early took charge on Monday, Aug. 3rd. Mr. Early was one of the organizers of the company and is part owner of the corporation, which has substantial backing. His numerous Chicago friends heartily wish him pronounced success in his new field.

E. A. Barrymore, who has been appointed Western manager of the Chicago Morning Telegraph to succeed Walter R. Early, arrived in the city Friday, July 31st. Mr. Barrymore has had wide newspaper experience, having been connected with the Munsey Publishing Co. for over four years. During that time he worked on all the Munsey newspaper publications, including the Boston Journal, the Washington Times, Baltimore News and the Philadelphia Times. Mr. Barrymore was also on the staff of the Public Ledger, Philadelphia, for two years. He will retain the former Chicago office of the Telegraph, Room 204, Schiller Bldg. He assumed his new duties Monday, Aug. 3rd.

C. W. Diehl, owner of the Garden Theater, Peoria, Ill., paid us a visit last week. Mr. Diehl was in the city specially to look up feature subjects to stimulate business during the summer season. The Garden seats 500 people and Mutual programs have been run for an admission of five cents.

"John Barleycorn" gave way to Lubin's "The Wolf" at Orchestra Hall, on Friday, July 31st. This six reel feature, based on Eugene Walter's play, has stimulated business considerably at this place. On the daily program is also the well-known three-reel Vitagraph comedy, "Mr. Bingle's Melodrama," which recently had a successful run in the Vitagraph Theater, New York City.

"The Last Concert," adapted from Ellis Glickman's play, started on a run at the Ziegfeld Theater, Monday, Aug. 3rd. Mr. Glickman takes the leading role in the photoplay.

"Cabiria" will remain at the Illinois until Sept. 1st. The presentation is considerably enhanced by the orchestra and grand opera chorus.

"Neptune's Daughter" entered the twelfth week of its run at the Fine Arts Theater, Monday, Aug. 3rd. Alfred Hamburger believes that he can give the beautiful diver, Annette Kellermann, a grand total of 23 weeks at this house.

"The Rosary," Rowland & Clifford's successful play, which has been presented all over the country, is now being filmed by the Selig Polyscope Co. in the western studios at Edendale.

Requests are pouring in rapidly to F. O. Neilsen's office, 720 Schiller Bldg., for bookings for "The Spoilers." Wherever played thus far, managers are vieing with each other for return dates. "The Spoilers" opened at the Valentine Theater, Toledo, O., for one week, on Sunday, Aug. 2nd. The Valentine seats 2,400 people and admissions for this attraction are 25 and 50 cents. "The Spoilers" will open a run of four weeks on Sunday, Aug. 9th, at the Broadway Theater, Detroit. The minimum admission at this house, and in all other large houses, is fixed at 25 cents. Considerable enterprise, not at all called for by contract, was recently shown by Mr. Nielsen so as to insure the arrival of "The Spoilers" films in time for the Sunday Matinee, Aug. 2nd, at Henry Boyle's Theater, Fond du Lac, Wis. The set of films to be used at this theater arrived in Milwaukee from Manitowoc, Wis., 50 minutes late, thus missing the train from Milwaukee to Fond du Lac, the next train for that point not leaving until 5:00 o'clock. Mr. Nielsen was notified by long distance phone in Chicago of these facts, and he immediately phoned his Milwaukee man to engage a high-powered motor car and take the reels to Boyle's Theater. This meant a 95-mile run, with three and a half hours to make it. The car arrived, on flat tires, at Henry Boyle's Theater just 15 minutes late for the opening of the matinee, after having sustained one puncture and one blowout.

C. Jay Williams

C. JAY WILLIAMS, for the past four years premier director of comedies for the Edison company, is the latest recruit to the staff of Universal directors. Mr. Williams will produce comedies for the Universal. It will probaby be during the first part of August that he will make the move to the Universal and immediately he will ride his trunk to the Pacific Coast where, at the Universal's Hollywood studios, he will take up his active duties. Accompanying him will be Mrs. Williams, who will be one of the leads in the new company to be formed.

C. Jay Williams.

To call the titles of the successful comedies that Mr. Williams has produced would require a profuse amount of editorial space. Among those, however, which have been stamped more thoroughly with public approval than others are such play-comedies as "Caste," a two-reel comedy adapted from the famous comedy of the same name by T. W. Robertson, "Why Girls Leave Home," a two-reel, a new version of the comedy that won favor several years ago, and the comedy series entitled "Mr. Wood B. Wedd."

Mr. Williams was born a long time ago in New York City and he is of Welsh and German extraction. When still a boy he decided to become an actor, and an actor he remained until he joined out with the moving pictures and became a director. In fact, as he says himself, he knew nothing of pictures until four years ago when a friend, a fellow actor, induced him to pose for the part of Beethoven in an Edison play, "Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata." That was over four years ago. He scored an immediate success and was engaged to appear in several other productions of the same company. Then he departed from pictures for a while to tour with Blanche Walsh in "The Test." But the seed had been sown; Mr. Williams was assured of the picture's future and so when he returned from this tour, he negotiated with the Edison for a position as director. And he landed.

Guy Standing

IT is now revealed that the star of "The Silver King," the first of the celebrated plays of Sir Arthur Jones to be filmed by the Famous Players, is Guy Standing. "The Silver King," undoubtedly one of the most famed plays of the past century, provides many unusual factors for pictorial reproduction, and the selection of Guy Standing for the title role suggests a judgment that could not be improved, because of his prominence on both the American and English stages, which greatly increases the value of his appearance in the production, and which in a unique manner corresponds with the international popularity of the subject.

Guy Standing.

The Famous Players have made arrangements to produce the American scenes of "The Silver King" in the West, in the exact localities in which the thrilling situations of the play occur. Henry Arthur Jones, on his recent visit to America, made a tour of the Famous Players studio, and took a keen interest in the preparations for the production of his play. "The Silver King" was but a short time ago given a command performance before the King and Queen of England.

FANS START "PEGGY" SNOW CLUB.

Miss Marguerite (Peggy) Snow, leading woman of the Thanhouser films, who is doing exceptional work as Countess Olga in "The Million Dollar Mystery," had quite an honor conferred upon her by some of the photoplay fans of America, who love to see her on the screen. Recently a letter came from Miss Kathryn Temple, Northboro, Massachusetts, asking "Peggy" to accept the honor of honorary president of the "Peggy" Snow Club, a gathering of young women admirers, who follow her work closely on the screen; adopt, so far as possible, clothing patterned after those worn by the best dressed women in the "movies," and meet once a month to plan for the present and future welfare of the club. Miss Snow was prevailed upon to accept the honor, and promised to send a letter of greeting, once each month, to the "Peggy" Snow Club, and sent, also, a large photograph in one of her best poses for the club to retain, with the admonition that it be framed and be held in the custody of the president until her successor was elected, when the portrait would pass into the keeping of the new president. Of course, these "Peggy" Snow clubs will become epidemic, and throughout the forty-eight States in America other "Peggy" Snow clubs will form, and to each Miss Snow plans to send a photograph so that the gathering of girls may have material evidence of her love and loyalty. And should requests come to Miss Snow from Great Britain, "Adorable Peggy" plans to acknowledge them and send her autographed photograph with the same restriction, i. e., that it will remain the property of the club and be held by each succeeding president. The plan advanced by Miss Temple was a club that would go to some theater in a body when one of the films advertising Miss Snow was shown, and after the entertainment meet at the home of one of the members to chat and dine and discuss. Sixteen members compose the first "Peggy" Snow Club, and the membership is unlimited.

WHERE IS NED FINLEY?

Ned Finley, the Vitagraph player and director, has mysteriously disappeared. Any information concerning his whereabouts will be gratefully welcomed by the Vitagraph Company of America, Brooklyn, N. Y. He went to Hendersonville, N. C., to produce some mountain pictures for the Vitagraph Company. His sudden disappearance has puzzled everyone and no one has been able to learn his whereabouts.

Film Men Inspect Willat Studios

"Doc" Willat and C. O. Baumann Show Friends and Associates Over the Big Plant.

ON the last day of July a party of film men, friends and associates of "Doc" Willat and Charles O. Baumann, motored from Times Square to Fort Lee to inspect the Willat Studios and Laboratories. What they found on the hill above the Hudson delighted as well as surprised them. While building operations were not finished, at the same time the work had so far progressed that but a few weeks will finish it. The area of the land owned by the company exceeds four acres, sufficient to allow great expansion of studio and factory space. Already completed are two studios, 60 by 120 feet on the ground, and 52 feet in height. They are practically entirely inclosed in glass. The dressing rooms are situated along the side of each structure. The very latest devices for artificial lighting have been installed. In one of the studios there is a tank, 15 by 25 feet, for water and trap scenes.

The property is at the corner of Main street and Linwood avenue. There is ample room for outdoor staging, and there are a variety of settings for picture work. Among the buildings is a little structure, its walls of uneven-sized brown stone, that has served about every picture company in the neighborhood of New York as an Irish cottage. Arrangements already have been made for the erection of four additional studios, duplicates of the two already built. Work on these will be started in a few weeks.

What particularly appealed to the visiting film men was the factory. This structure, as also is the case with the studios, represents the last word in efficiency. It is of two stories and in dimensions is about 100 by 150 feet. The entire construction is of brick and concrete—absolutely fireproof. In fact, one of the guests was impelled to remark as he passed through the various rooms: "Why, you folks easily may carry your own insurance!"

Many innovations have been installed in the factory. For example, the old tank method of washing will not be used. Instead a large washroom has been built with hundreds of spray nozzles inserted in the ceiling. Water will be forced at high pressure through these nozzles, and the film, which will hang on specially constructed racks immediately below the nozzles, will be thoroughly sprayed. The washroom will accommodate 100 racks of film. The great elevated tank on the grounds has a capacity of 25,000 gallons and will furnish ample water supply.

Another novelty will be the drying room. The air before it enters this compartment is forced through water and "washed" of all dust particles and moisture, thus making the air clean and dry. The machinery for this process was manufactured under "Doc." Willat's supervision, and the air condition of the drying room can be so regulated that all films can be uniformly and quickly dried.

The capacity is 1,500,000 feet per week, and judging by the spacious quarters assigned to the various departments it can be handled with comfort and speed.

In personal command of the entire plant will be C. A. (Doc) Willat, who is known to the entire trade as one of the great technical experts of the motion picture industry. Until a short time ago he was the technical director of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, and for a long time before that he successfully managed and directed the entire output of the Imp company. The Fort Lee studio and factory represent much thought and long consideration on the part of Mr. Willat. Many months ago he determined to build a plant that not only would be one of the largest, if not the largest commercial establishments in the country, but also one that would represent the composite of the experience of technicians in all picture-making countries. He went abroad last year and visited practically every film establishment of importance. When he returned to the United States he continued his study of methods. Among the trips he took was one to Rochester, N. Y., where he spent an entire week in the laboratory of the Eastman company.

Associated with Mr. Willat is Charles O. Baumann, whose connections with the New York Motion Picture Company and whose progressiveness are thoroughly well known to the trade at large. Mr. Baumann is president of the company, Arthur Butler Graham is vice-president, and Mr. Willat is secretary and treasurer. The executive offices of the company are on the ninth floor of the Longacre Building, Forty-second street and Broadway.

On the return from the Studios the party was entertained by Mr. Willat and Mr. Baumann at Reisenweber's, where toasts were drunk to the success of the new enterprise that begins under such favorable auspices.

Mack Sennett Talks of His Work

Visiting Comedian Intimates that the Keystone Company Is to Take Up a New Line of Production.

FOR the first time in a couple of years Mack Sennett last week had a good look at the sky-line of New York City from the heights of Fort Lee. The last time the Keystone producer had stood on the hill was in the days when he was making the initial pictures of the brand that has made its trail around and over the world and laughed itself into the hearts of practically all picturegoers. Mr. Sennett had gone to Fort Lee as a member of the party of a score of film men who were looking over the fine plant of the Willat Studios. It just happened that in piling into autos in Times Square it fell to the writer to be the partner of the soft-spoken comedian. Mr. Sennett said he expected to be in New York about ten days. Together with Thomas H. Ince he had made the trip to the Atlantic Coast for the purpose of taking up business matters with the officers of the New York Motion Picture Company.

The chief bit of information divulged by Mr. Sennett, news of immediate importance to picture followers, is that he brought east with him a six-reel comedy—one on which he had, with all the members of the Keystone Company, put in fourteen weeks. The comedian said the production contained all that he had in himself. "I have put into it all that I have got," he said with emphasis. "I want to show it before I return to the Coast, and I guess it will be arranged. We have spared no necessary expense. As an illustration of this, we wanted a real snow scene. A company was sent up into the mountains, twelve or fourteen thousand feet above sea level. The party camped out in the snow and was gone a week. Some fine stuff was obtained, but we used just one hundred feet. That was what we wanted."

A week's trip for a hundred feet of film—a hundred seconds on the screen—seems like a record for a dramatic production. Mr. Sennett would not say that the six reels were all comedy—"there's a little of everything," he said. Asked as to who had written the scenario, he intimated there was none. "I framed the story as I went along," he said. "I find this method has merits. It gives an elasticity to the plot; we are enabled to take advantage of unforseen situations and to make the most of them. You know, personally, I never use a script. While I plan most of the pictures I produce myself, I do not 'write' them. I do supervise the work of other Keystone directors. Usually we assemble the company and rehearse the story. The entire action is gone over, and to a stenographer I outline details—minor as well as major ones. When we get through there is in hand a real script."

The conversation turned to the subject of engaging players, on which it developed that Mr. Sennett had decided opinions. "I don't believe in luring players from other manufacturers," said the comedian. "When I want an actor I go as a rule to the stage. There's a vast number of stage people, a lot of them good, anxious to get into picture work. I will not employ an actor that is under engagement. If a picture player out of work comes to me looking for employment, that is another question. He is tried out until we are satisfied that he can bring to us the material for which we are searching. Not until we are satisfied is he placed in stock."

On the run back to the city Mr. Sennett asked a number of questions himself. "Where do most of the reviewers see the pictures of which they write?" he inquired. "Do they see them at the studios or the company offices, or do they see them in a theater surrounded by an audience?"

Mr. Sennett was informed that with few exceptions, notably a majority of the pictures in the licensed group, films were reviewed in private projection rooms. "But in case the subjects are reviewed in a theater do reviewers give heed to the attitude of the audience?" persisted Mr. Sennett. It was indicated in reply that a reviewer who would fail to take into account the attitude of the audience would overlook one of the chief aims of film reviewing—which is, of course, to give exhibitors a suggestion as to the desirability of the subject.

"Do you think exhibitors follow the reviews in the trade papers—are they guided in their selection of a program by criticisms, favorable or unfavorable?" pursued the Keystone producer. "So far as the Moving Picture World is concerned," was the reply, "there is every reason to believe there are many exhibitors who pay very close attention to the reviews. The exhibitor wants the facts—even if they be unfavorable to the manufacturer. If a picture contains situations that are suggestive, for instance, he wants to know it, that he may be guided accordingly. Some pictures will go strongly before any kind of a house, some will go strongly in some and less so in others. The alert exhibitor is looking for tips on productions that will please his clientele and also for tips on those that may displease or that may prove to be of negative quality as entertainment for his patrons. The reviewer is placed between the maker of a subject and the exhibitor—sometimes he cannot please both by telling the facts as he sees them."

Mr. Sennett smiled. "Well, I must say the World has been very fair with Keystone. No, I don't think it impossible for a producer to get a fair slant on the quality of his own production. I have been in the picture business quite a number of years now and I think I have had sufficient experience, I think I may say I am broad enough, to look at my own stuff from the viewpoint of the public. That is just what I try to do. I estimate our pictures before they leave the studio, and it is fair to your reviewers to say that when the paper reaches us as a rule we are not far apart in our opinions."

Mr. Sennett has been in the picture business about seven years. As will be remembered, his first work was with the Biograph, and with that company he remained five years. Before that he was for seven or eight years on the stage. When the comedian was asked if he had in contemplation any changes in the product of the Keystone, he admitted that he had.

"We intend to try steadily to improve our productions and also from time to time to change the character of the work," he said. "We are nearing the stage where we want to advance the scope of our subjects—not that the public shows any indications of being tired of Keystone stuff, but we desire to anticipate the wishes of the public, to keep ahead of the times. We are considering entering a new field. It is, of course, in these days a difficult thing to do, but we prefer to be progressive now rather than have these steps forced upon us later.

"In spite of the fact that we spend a great deal of money on our pictures, we intend to spend more. It is our view that to be stingy in making pictures is to pursue a policy that is penny wise and pound foolish. A poor way to make money is to try to save it out of the film. No, I do not think the European war will materially affect the sales of Keystone. In fact, it may increase rather than decrease them.

"You know our method of making pictures is different from that of many. We have no stated time for making a production. If three weeks are necessary to film a certain subject and we find on examining it that it will be stronger as a single reel than a multiple, we cut it down to the thousand feet. We believe the money well invested. We just say to ourselves that we will give the exhibitor a treat this week at our expense. So it is that a lot of our subjects run into high figures, but we feel by so doing we are making more friends for Keystone.

"It is no easy matter to get a job with our company. A player knows, though, that once he is in stock he is there to stay and I believe it improves his efficiency all around. He knows he has been tried out, and he feels secure."

The Keystone producer said he would be in New York probably until the end of the week—August 8.

G. B.

BRONAUGH—DAVEY.

The marriage of Allen M. Davey to Margaret M. Bronaugh in Los Angeles, California, on June 30, has just been announced. Mr. Davey is a photographic expert in the Universal plant at Hollywood, and is rated as one of the finest camera men in the business. He is a brother-in-law of David Horsley, President of the Centaur Film Co., and was born and brought up in Bayonne, New Jersey, where he is almost as well known as the Centaur wizard himself.

"Men and Women"

Biograph-K. & E. Three Reel Picture a Humanly-Produced and Pleasingly Artistic Melodrama of Modern American Life.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE best among our modern melodramas, those that are carefully written to be free from our squeezed lemons, the trite situations, and are produced with painstaking regard for things that are convincingly human, are doubly pleasing to the popular audience. If anything was ever democratic our American melodramas are. They are apt to be shot through and through with popular conceptions of fair-play in government, of the essential rights of the soul even when the body has been blindly trapped into some infraction of the cold law, yet is deeply repentant; but most of all they stand firm for the under-dog fighting to regain a place in the sunlight with his kind to which his good will and ability give him a just right. They are mighty healthy to us at home and they carry a freight of stimulation to eyes of people longing for fair-play abroad.

This picture, "Men and Women," produced by the Biograph players in conjunction with Klaw & Erlanger, is just such a melodrama and makes an offering that is sure to please all who understand these things it stands for. It is clean, wholesome and human and has the quality that gathers in all our faculty of attention until the spectator—his mind not loaded with irrelevant matters—fairly listens as well as watches. In its double love story nothing is permitted to cheapen sentiment in spite of the fact that of its three heroes two are technically embezzlers. There is no weakly acted character in it; it is played by a strong cast, and all its roles stand out as distinct individualities, interesting, human and likable. Its scenes are filled with the abandon of absolute naturalness. Directed by James Kirkwood, it is one of the most human pictures dealing with this subject we have ever had the good fortune to see. The photography is artistic and delightful.

It is not easy to say, among all its characters, which is the most satisfying. There is Robert Stevens (Lionel Barrymore), who, as the story opens, is sentenced to six years for embezzlement. He serves his term; becomes a millionaire in Arizona and is elected governor—ignoring the outer form of probability, yet convincing. We are not told that he was guilty; his character suggests to us that he wasn't wholly so. He is a fine old man and is played with vigor. Then there is Agnes, his daughter (Blanche Sweet), and her schoolgirl friend Ruth (Gertrude Robinson), both wholly charming in their girlishness, who could tell which is the better? The two boys, Will (Marshal Neilan), brother of Ruth and sweetheart of Agnes—he borrows a bundle of bonds from his bank to make a showing over night for the sake of an investment and they are stolen from him—and the other boy, Ned (Frank Crane), friend of Will's and Ruth's sweetheart—he is accused of the theft of the bonds but is saved at the close by Will's confession—are both convincing, true and vigorous as played. The stock broker who hypothecates the bonds is a very strong figure as played by F. Kerzog, while Frank Norcross, Cohen, president of the bank, is also satisfying. Then the district attorney (F. Hearn), who convicts Stevens and in the second generation is counsel for the bank, and the mother of Will and Ruth (Hattie de Loro) also adequately carry their roles. Of the lesser figures all are satisfying.

The plot is clear, logical and effectively constructed. It is an exceptionally good offering for all kinds of patrons. Spectators watching it at an airdome might put umbrellas up; but we think they'd stay till it was done in spite of a drizzle.

IRA L. CUNNINGHAM.

THE motion picture seems to have exerted a strong attraction for newspaper men. Another member of the staff of the Evening Sun has left the quarters of that publication on Park Row and will try to make his way in the world of films.

Ira L. Cunningham.

Ira L. Cunningham, who has been telegraph editor of the Evening Sun and at one time held the same place on the Morning Sun, has deserted Park Row for the heights of East Forty-first street. He began his duties this week as advertising manager and general publicity agent for the International Education League and the Church and School Service Bureau. The Duke of Manchester is at the head of the first-named association and the Rev. Dr. William Carter is president of the latter. Both organizations are entering the motion picture business on a large scale.

Mr. Cunningham has had a wide experience in newspaper work throughout the country, especially in the West, where he did his first work on a newspaper as the "devil" in an Iowa country office. His experience in publicity work has been from time to time. The last big job of the sort which he has undertaken was that of making American readers familiar with Dr. Maria Montessori when that famous Italian educator visited this country last winter.

WAR MAY DELAY ALL STAR WORK.

Considerable consternation is being expressed at the offices of the All Star Feature Corporation as to whether or not William Faversham the international theatrical star for whose services the All Star people have contracted and who is to begin production on "The World" early in August, has succeeded in getting away from Europe.

When last heard from Mr. Faversham was sojourning in the South of France with his wife and at the present hour, his representatives here have been unable to ascertain whether he has been balked in his securing passage back home because of the present cancellation in steamship sailings owing to the great European War.

"Across the Border"

A Vigorous Melodrama of Arms Smuggling Across the Mexican Border in Three Reels by Warner's Features.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

A GOOD amount of snap and dash is expected in films made by the Albuquerque Company; the mountain air out there seems to invigorate the nervous systems of producers and players alike. We get plenty of fast riding and the kind of incidents that make the audience jump up or hold its breath for a moment. There is even more of this vigorous quality than usual in "Across the Border," a three-reel melodrama by the Albuquerque players and offered by Warner's Features. The story deals with an outlaw band, half Mexican and half American, that is making a business of smuggling arms over the line to the revolutionists. The picture's hero is a United States lieutenant who, seeing some suspicious operations, comes too close to the outlaws' camp and, after his horse has fallen down a steep embankment—this scene will give a thrill, but it is very distressing; for the dumb beast goes down head-over-heels to his death it seems—the rider is captured by the gang and kept a prisoner in the camp.

This camp itself, the way it is managed and the life in it, is most interesting. It is just enough like the usual background of this kind of romantic, wild melodrama to be clearly understandable by all, yet has the convincing freshness to go with the kind of incident that happens there. The get-there quality of this picture's scenes is due mostly to the "interest" that the camera takes in it. The camera gets around and sees the camp and the neighborhood from this angle or that, comes close up or stands far off as the case demands, and makes us appreciate its wildness. There's a cavalry encampment not far from the camp, and from this one looks out over the wildest kind of country. And as the action unfolds, the spectator is sure to exclaim now and again, "What a fine scene!" This will be because the producer has handled his action well, because of the backgrounds and because the camera man knew how to be interesting. The characters of the story are, many of them, fierce and rough, and backgrounds, characters and story go perfectly together.

The lieutenant being a prisoner knows too much to be a safe neighbor, if free to bring the cavalry down on the outlaws, and though not at first ill-treated, is guarded closely. The men have work to do. They are out running guns across, so the daughter of the chief smuggler is detailed as special warder. Things don't go well. The gang is caught at the ford with a load of high explosives. There's a fight with a squad of the cavalry and an explosion. This tends to make them ugly. What is more, one of the gang becomes jealous of the lieutenant's place in the girl's affections. He attempts to give him a taste of "Apache torture"; ties a rattlesnake so that it can almost strike the staked-out victim, who is left to the snake's tender mercies. The girl sees and kills the snake, a real rattler; sets free the lieutenant and, later, brings the cavalry to the rescue. These last scenes give galloping horses over the rough Arizona hill country and are filled with thrill. As a whole the picture makes a strong offering, somewhat brutal in places, but filling a demand of the time. It certainly is a well directed and interesting picture.

WARNER'S FEATURES TO OFFER COMPLETE PROGRAM.

A complete weekly program of approximately twenty-one reels is announced by Warner's Features. The date for this service to commence is not announced, but a very near day will see the consummation of the plan. Regarding the character of the program P. A. Powers, president of the company, said: "It will include an unusual diversity of high-class pictures, and meet the requirements of every enterprising exhibitor in the country. There will be one, two and three reel releases, with longer ones when the quality warrants. The program will have a very wide appeal."

Warner's Features now has thirty-two exchanges, located at the following cities: Atlanta, Ga.; Boston, Mass.; Syracuse, N. Y.; Chicago, Ill.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Cleveland, Ohio; Dallas, Texas; Denver, Colo.; Indianapolis, Ind.; Kansas City, Kan.; Los Angeles, Cal.; Minneapolis, Minn.; New Orleans, La.; New York, N. Y.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; San Francisco, Cal.; St. Louis, Mo.; Seattle, Wash.; Montreal, Canada; Detroit, Mich.; Washington, D. C.; Des Moines, Iowa; Spokane, Wash.; London, Eng.; Chicago, Ill.; Buffalo, N. Y.; Louisville, Ky.; Wilkes-Barre, Pa.; Portland, Oregon; Portland, Maine.

More Voluntary Censorship

Plans Being Made to Extend the Influence of the National Board of Censorship—J. W. Binder in Charge of the Campaign.

J. W. BINDER, who proposed a "board of trade" organization for the motion picture business in an extended address delivered during the motion picture exposition at Grand Central Palace, New York, last June, has been engaged to direct a campaign for the extension of the influence of the National Board of Censorship to every community throughout the United States. Mr. Binder is located at the offices of the National Board, 70 Fifth avenue, New York. To a representative of the Moving Picture World he explained that there were two things that menaced the solid growth of the motion picture business: legalized censorship and bad pictures. He believed that the percentage of bad pictures passed by the National Board was negligible, but that the few bad pictures not submitted to the Board were responsible for 99 per cent. of the criticism directed against pictures generally and created the excuse for legal censorship. He hopes to be able to bring this small number of pictures under the supervision of the Board.

"To bring about this very desirable end is the prime object of the campaign which I have undertaken for the National Board," said Mr. Binder. "In working it out, no untried theories will be used. Every step has been proven by actually organizing similar committees in widely separated centers throughout the United States. These committees have been organized for from one month to one and a half years, and it is safe to use the results obtained as fair examples of what can be achieved by this plan when it shall have been extended to cover the United States."

Conditions in Milwaukee, where such a board has been working with the National Board for some time is cited as an example of the conditions which Mr. Binder hopes to find all over the country.

Another object of the plan is to carry on a campaign of publicity through the trade papers, the magazines and daily papers exposing the fallacy of legalized censorship. This work involves the creating of a campaign fund and Mr. Binder expects soon to start upon the war path.

Mr. Binder is a man eminently qualified by training and experience for the work he has undertaken for the Board. He has spent much of his life in organizing campaigns on a National scale, both of a business and political nature. Among his clients in the past have been the American Telegraph and Telephone Company, the United Hardware Company, the Dictaphone Company of America and others. He organized and put on a business basis, the pre-nomination campaign of Woodrow Wilson when he was a candidate for the Presidency, doing this work for National Chairman McCombs.

BALSHOFER VISITS NEW YORK.

Fred Balshofer, creator and manager of the Sterling Comedy Company releasing through the Universal Program, has just completed a flying visit to New York and the home offices of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. He traveled alone, and while the desire for a short respite from his arduous duties was the principal motive which brought him on, he accomplished some important business while in town.

Mr. Balshofer left for the Coast July 28 with the promise of many new and surprising things to come in the way of Sterling comedies. "Incidentally," said Mr. Balshofer, "I desired while on my visit here in New York to glean some information relative to how the Sterling 'kid' pictures were going. My investigations have been more than satisfying; I find that they are beng highly appreciated and are selling well. However, as you know, Sterling comedies are continually on the improve. Only recently we acquired Gordon Griffith, considered one of the ablest and cleverest 'kid' comedians in the business today."

KERRIGAN'S FATHER DIES.

John Kerrigan, father of the well-known moving picture star, Warren Kerrigan, died Wednesday night, July 29, at his home in New Albany, Ind., after an illness of several months. He was born seventy-seven years ago in Dunstan, Ireland. He moved to Canada and later to New Albany, where he resided for forty years. He leaves his wife, Mrs. Sarah MacLean Kerrigan, who went to Los Angeles, Cal., a daughter, Mrs. Kathleen Kerrigan Clement, who arrived recently from California, and five sons, Warren and Wallace Kerrigan, of Los Angeles, Edward, Robert and Harry Kerrigan, of New Albany. Mrs. Clement is a widely known actress, and Warren and Wallace are leaders in their profession.

Bangs Laboratories

Pretentious Plan for Handling Negative and Positive Products—High-class Artists to be Employed.

THE Bangs Laboratories, Inc., will be located at 69-71 West 90th street, New York City, and ready for business about September 1st. Frank C. Bangs, the well-known protographer, will be the managing director, his assistants being the finest photo-chemists, operators and developers procurable. It is the intention of the new concern to limit itself to the highest possible forms of handling motion picture film, and the building, which has been elaborately prepared for the new occupants, will constitute one of the finest motion picture laboratories and studios in the world. Associated with Mr. Bangs, the treasurer of the company, is C. J. Hite, vice-president, and Louis E. Jennings, president.

In order that the intelligent work of the exceptionally efficient corps of artists will not be jeopardized by atmospheric changes or conditions, the temperature and humidity in all operating rooms will be mechanically controlled and kept the same at all times. The chemical department will be completeness itself, being installed so that any sort of photographic achievements or experiments may be made. Every feature of the laboratories has been conceived with the sole idea of giving every inch of film handled the best possible treatment. All mechanical aids, tending toward eliminating unnecessary handling or making for increased speed in developing, are included in the equipment of the plant, so it may be readily understood that the proposed mission of the Bangs Laboratories will be realized. The capacity will be one and one-half million feet of film weekly, all representing the highest grade work ever given to motion photography.

Bangs Laboratories Building.

The top floor will be devoted to a glass-covered studio, underneath which are ample dressing and work rooms. Artificial light will be used when the natural light prohibits desired results. The glass dome is rounded, made of specially prepared glass and a brilliant, yet soft diffused light is assured when the daylight is worthy of the name. The building stands in such a position that there is no neighboring interference. There is not a shadow in any portion of the entire studio.

The ground floor will be devoted to the executive offices, reception rooms and shipping and receiving departments. The basement will include a fireproof storage vault. The second and third floors will be given over to the developing rooms. From the start, the building has been planned with the idea of making it the most complete laboratory ever conceived, in order to entirely eliminate every possibility of failure in securing the best results with the film being handled. It is not so large as many studio laboratories, but as a model of completeness, and stands without a peer.

The company will be prepared to handle the product of producing firms desiring exceptional photographic results. Negatives will be received and developed and the prints made, toned, tinted and finished on contract or with any special arrangements. The guarantee of the newly formed concern backs up their work, so it may logically be expected that a new standard in artistry in development and printing and finishing will soon appear. At least, the Bangs laboratories, with its splendid corps of high-grade workers and its wonderfully complete equipment, will answer a long felt want in the field pitifully deficient in more than ordinary work.

HENRY J. VERNOT.

MERRY blue eyes, with golden quality to them, a smile that brightens everything around him, a shake of the hand that makes you feel ten years younger—that is the first impression which you get of Henry J. Vernot of the "Finger of Fate" and of "Detective Craig's Coups" fame, when you meet him at the big Pathe Studio, over in Jersey.

Henry J. Vernot.

Just talk to him and you will find in Vernot a most interesting personality. Vernot's life has been one of action. He was graduated in literature and philosophy in the universities of Paris and Berlin. Then he became a newspaper writer.

In spite of his activities he wrote seven plays, which were all produced on Paris stages. "Our Daily Bread," a little one-act masterpiece, had a run of over three hundred performances. He also translated into French the plays of Heinrich von Kleist and of Friedrich Hebel, the stories of Richard Harding Davis and a number of Kipling's best poems—for Vernot is a poet, too. Eight years ago as a newspaperman he visited America in the course of his travels. He liked the country. In December, 1910, Gaumont & Co. purchased from him nineteen scenarios. For two years he was a director at Gaumont's. Then came the opportunity to return to America on the American Eclair staff. Here Mr. Vernot wrote and produced "The Vengeance of the Fakir," "The Bonny, Bonny Banks of Loch Lomon'," "Steel," "Rob Roy," etc. His engagement with Pathé Fréres followed and he is doing good work for that firm.

"NEPTUNE'S DAUGHTER" A HIT AT PORT WASHINGTON.

Messrs. Newman & Filon, managers of the Nassau Theater at Port Washington, New York, a popular suburb on Long Island, exhibited the Universal feature "Neptune's Daughter" on Wednesday, July 29, to a large and enthusiastic audience. The afternoon show was unusually large and the evening performance was a "turn-away." Every inch of standing room was occupied in addition to the 750 seating capacity of the house. It was estimated that about one thousand persons were present. Outside the house both sides of the street were lined with automobiles to the number of seventy-five. For several days after the exhibition of the picture it was the chief topic of conversation throughout the town, and many of the boys and girls have since been practicing the "mermaid stroke" shown by Miss Kellermann when in swimming. Many of the patrons of the Nassau have asked Manager Newman to bring the subject back for a return date.

Edmund Lawrence

EDMUND LAWRENCE, the well-known producer and manager of Kalem's New York Studio, has been connected with the stage since a child. He made his actual debut when but sixteen years of age with Frederick Warde, as Francois in "Richelieu." Then followed some hard experience in various repertoire companies.

The eminent tragedian, Thomas W. Keene, saw the lad play and secured him for a term of years, and Mr. Lawrence ascribes the success which he achieved later was due entirely to the kindly interest taken in him by the popular actor, of whom Mr. Lawrence often gratefully quotes the Great Bard. "He was a man, take him all in all, we shall never look upon his like again." After Mr. Keene's retirement from the stage, due to paralysis, Mr. Lawrence identified himself with Julia Marlowe during the meteoric rise of that famous star—first as stage director and later on played the leading character and comedy roles in her repertoire. After a brilliant career of some years with Miss Marlowe, Mr. Lawrence appeared in rapid succession in the many New York productions of Francis Wilson, whose understudy he became, appearing in Wilson's roles many times.

Edmund Lawrence.

Later Mr. Lawrence originated prominent characters with Lillian Russell, E. H. Sothern, Henrietta Crossman, De Wolf Hopper, etc., until he was selected to star with Raymond Hitchcock and Marie Cahill in "Three Little Lambs." Then followed starring engagements in musical comedy and farce until an unfortunate attack of laryngitis and subsequent unskillful operation impaired Mr. Lawrence's voice, so temporarily he turned to posing in the silent drama. Realizing the future great possibiilties of the photoplay, Mr. Lawrence studied the technique of the art thoroughly, familiarizing himself with every detail. Three years ago he associated himself with the Kalem company, as producing manager of the New York studio; during which time he has produced many notable pictures, including those of Hazel Neason, Little Adelaide Lawrence, the original Alice Joyce-Tom Moore series, and Anna Nielsson and Guy Coombs.

Mr. Lawrence's pictures are distinguished by his extreme attention to detail, and the artistic quiet, natural method of acting displayed by his players, exemplified in "The Christian" and "The Senator's Dishonor," which are contrasted strongly with the swiftly moving melodramatic action of "The Other Half of the Note" and "A Modern Jekyll and Hyde" to the reverent religious atmosphere conveyed in "The Pawnbroker's Daughter" and "The Passover Miracle."

Mr. Lawrence has terminated his engagement with the Kalem Company to undertake the production of big features, in which his remarkable eight-year-old child, little Adelaide Lawrence, long famous as the "Kalem Child," in "The Barefoot Boy," "The Dumb Messenger," "High Born Child and the Beggar" and "The Missing Jewels," will create some new and distinct ideas in child's parts written especially for her.

SPECIAL NOTICE FROM PATHE FRERES.

In order to give the readers of the Pathe Daily News more comprehensive views of the big situation in Europe without sacrificing American pictures of interest, Pathe Freres announces that they have decided to discontinue the Pathe Daily, as a daily, and will put it out instead twice a week, of approximately a thousand feet each issue. It will be shipped on Wednesdays and Saturdays and will be released as soon as it is received.

SIDNEY ASCHER ANNOUNCES A DAUGHTER.

Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Ascher announce the birth of a daughter on July 25. Mr. Ascher is a well-known New York exhibitor and feature man. The Moving Picture world extend to him and his wife the congratulations of the trade.

ALL STAR TO PRODUCE "SHORE ACRES."

Headed by John H. Pratt, the new All Star Director, formerly leading man and director for the Reliance Company, who has been for the past six months allied with the All Star Feature Corporation in the capacity of Assistant to Augustus Thomas, the All Star Company of players, numbering twenty-seven, will leave the early part of next week for the shores of Maine to begin the production of James A. Herne's immortal drama of down East folk, "Shore Acres," which for so many years has thrilled theater-goers of this country and, in fact, the world.

Mr. Pratt for the past few weeks has been co-operating with Louis Reeves Harrison, the writer of the scenario, and together they have decided upon several effects which are bound to stamp the coming production as one of the leaders of the season.

CLEVELAND LEAGUE REORGANIZED.

At a highly successful meeting of the Cleveland Local of the M. P. E. L. of A. in the old headquarters in the Columbia building, Wednesday, July 29, members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, Local No. 1, reorganized and placed into office a new roster of exhibitors. S. E. Morris was elected president; "Bob" Manchester, Painesville, vice-president; W. H. Horsey, secretary; Frank Kinney, treasurer. Mr. Horsey was reelected to his position. As a further means to the activity of the league a board of directors was named as follows: Foster Simmons, Ernie Schwartz, S. A. Lustig, George Heinbruch and Edward Kohl. The reorganization follows the lines laid out by retiring President Megowan, who advised the exhibitors at the "peace conferences" recently held that when the members of the Photoplay Exhibitors' Board of Trade returned to the League all the officers would retire in favor of a new election.

WORKING ON AMALGAMATION.

William A. Douque, secretary of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of the State of New York, has notified the executive board that a meeting of that body will be held at the Marlborough-Blenheim Hotel, Tuesday, August 11th, for the purpose of formulating plans for the amalgamation of exhibitors throughout the State of New York. The annual meeting of the Motion Picture Exhibitors Association of Greater New York, for the election of officers, was postponed until after the above meeting had been held.

TO MANUFACTURERS AND DISTRIBUTORS.

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York desire to remind you of a statement made in all the trade journals a few months ago, that no programs will be published for any ball or other function given by the above organization, and those soliciting advertisements for same do so without the sanction of the organization, and we appeal to the manufacturers to assist us by refusing to give advertisements for any programs.

NEW YORK ASSOCIATION HEADQUARTERS.

The Motion Picture Exhibitors Association of New York desires to inform the trade that it has established headquarters at rooms 33 and 34 in the Marlboro-Blenheim Hotel, Broadway and 35th street, New York City. Special facilities have been provided for the accommodation of exhibitors visiting New York City and all are invited to make use of them.

UNIVERSAL GETS LUBIN PLAYERS.

The latest acquisitions by the Universal Company in the way of popular photoplayers includes Harry Myers, for a long time an actor and director with the Lubin Company. Along with Mr. Myers comes Rosemary Theby and Brinsley Shaw. Miss Theby was first with the Vitagraph Company and is one of the beauties of the screen. Brinsley Shaw was once an Essanay star. Both have been playing in the Lubin stock under the direction of Mr. Myers and have appeared in several notable productions. The trio will form a new company, attached for the present to the Imp studio.

BUYERS COMING TO TOWN.

Messrs. H. A. East and Guy W. Green, of the Nebraska Feature Company, of Lincoln, Neb., will be in New York in late August with the intention of viewing features and purchasing such as seem suitable for the coming season's business in their territory.

Manufacturers' Advance Notes

"THE ENVOY EXTRAORDINARY" (Sawyer).

The sample print of "The Envoy Extraordinary," the first picture produced by the Santa Barbara Motion Picture Co. of California, will arrive in New York the 10th of August and will be shown by Sawyer, Inc., in their projection room.

The final scenes ending with a thrilling ride made by Jack Nelson, who plays Captain Balfour, the Envoy, were made at Montecito, where the wonderful scenery furnished beautiful backgrounds for the story.

Scene from "The Envoy Extraordinary" (Sawyer).

A bad accident was averted while the Company was doing some of the water stuff out beyond Castle Rock. A scene, representing the French fisheries, was being enacted when a wind squall capsized the sail boat in which Clara Morse and Jack Nelson were making their escape from the French steamer.

Lorimer Johnston was in a launch with the camera man and his quick action resulted in saving Mr. Nelson and Miss Morse with no worse effects than a good ducking. The picture is filled with thrills from start to finsh. The actual polo game furnished many of the interesting moments.

"DAN" DRAWS TEARS.

During the past week at the Projection Rooms of the All Star Feature Corporation, as guests of George H. Irving, director of the picture, were assembled twenty-seven members of societies representing the North and South, who were particularly interested to see the manner in which the delicate situation of the Civil War had been treated.

The appeal made to the emotion by the capable work done by Lew Dockstader in the title role of "Dan" was such as to cause at one time by actual count, the use of twenty-one handkerchiefs employed to wipe away the tears.

"THROUGH THE FLAMES" (Rex.)

Friendship is a never-drying fountain as material for stories, pictures, poetry and plays. In "Through the Flames," a two-part Rex drama, it plays an important part, ranged alongside of the tender passion of love of a little child. Jealousy and evil are but the background for undying friendship and love. But, passing over the splendid human-interest phase of this play—which is a big feature in itself—your attention is directed to the great spectacular, dramatic effects of the play.

Directed by Otis Turner, master of spectacularism, and featuring such artists as Herbert Rawlinson, Wm. Worthington and Anna Little, we have one of the most realistic, impressive and thoroughly thrilling fire scenes ever produced in pictures. And this because the fire is a genuine fire in a big tenement house, and a rescue by the hero, Herbert Rawlinson, of his friend and fellow fireman is fraught with apparent danger, and unconventional dexterity and realism. From the roof of a smoke-enveloped house, he pushes his way down into the flames, and with a true man's strength brings his unconscious friend out of the very jaws of death. As the scenes unfold showing this sensational, powerful incident, the spectator is held fast in the iron grip of suspense and interest. One is shown what these young "fire eaters" of the big cities really have to go up against—the dangers they face, the awful risks they take in protecting the lives and property of the citizens. It is all a lesson in heroism, unselfishness and regard for duty. The play will be released August 13.

Scene from "Through the Flames" (Rex).

ASKS $5,000 DAMAGES FOR "$5,000 CATS."

The right of a motion picture company to take films of prize winners at animal shows will be thrashed out in a damage action brought by Delta E. Connelly against the Thomas A. Edison corporation which is on file in the United States District Court.

The plaintiff alleges that she exhibited several pet cats at Madison Square Garden the latter part of December, 1912, and succeeded in winning a number of prizes with her entries. She avers the defendant film company took pictures of her pets without her consent and that since that time the film entitled "Five Thousand Dollars Worth of Cat" has been displayed in numerous motion picture theaters.

As a result of the exhibition of her pets on the screen the plaintiff asserts she has been held up to ridicule and obloquy and has suffered humiliation and mortification as her society friends learned she was "appearing" in the pictures with her blue ribbon winners. She demands $5,000 damages.

"THE DOWNWARD PATH" (Lubin).

The title tells the bent of the story, which is one of the most excellent lessons to the reckless youth. This boy had a brilliant and rich future if he could have curbed his early inclination to dissipation, but his self-will and madness led to terrible consequences and ruin. Will M. Ritchey, who wrote the story, has not overstepped reason, but evolved one of the most dramatic tales ever put before the camera. The photoplay has been made under the direction of Captain Wilbert Melville at his picturesque studio in Los Angeles and played by the pick of his company, including Velma Whitman, W. W. Campbell, W. E. Parsons, L. C. Shumway, and many others. The lovers of reasonable and convincing melodrama will much enjoy this picture.

"BRANSFORD IN ARCADIA" (Eclair).

A highly sensational and interesting photoplay to be released Wednesday, August 19th is "Bransford in Arcadia" or "The Little Eohippus." This production is in three reels and is by Eugene Manlove Rhodes, the famous delineator of Western characters. The story was filmed at the Tucson studios of the Eclair Film Company, Inc., and the scenic backgrounds are most beautiful, while the exciting incidents and dramatic climaxes make a picture a worthy sucessor to "The Caballero's Way." J. W. Johnson, Edna Payne and Norbert A. Myles play the leading roles, and these three Western favorites are at their very best in their respective parts.

A VISIT FROM NORTH YAKIMA.

Mrs. Frederick Mercy, wife of a prominent exhibitor of North Yakima, Washington, was a caller at the New York offices of this publication on August 3. Mr. Mercy is the manager and owner of the Majestic theater of North Yakima. The house seats nearly one thousand and is reported to be doing good business. Mrs. Mercy is visiting her mother at Newark, N. J.

"WHEN THE BEACON FAILED" (Kleine).

Tuesday, August 18, has been set as the date for the release through the General Film Company of George Kleine's thrilling two-part feature subject, "When the Beacon Failed." This picture, described as an exciting story of the sea, undoubtedly will be accorded the wide public favor it merits.

The story is a gripping one. Jim is assistant to his father, the aged keeper of the Brighton Lighthouse, and in love with Mary, the innkeeper's daughter. His rival is Bill, a fisherman, who plans revenge when Mary tells him she is going to marry Jim.

Scene from "When the Beacon Failed" (Kleine).

Jim's father is suddenly taken ill and Jim is thus left solely responsible for the safety of the shipping sailing along the coast at night. Bill takes advantage of this fact to waylay Jim and attack him, foreseeing that if any accidents occur as the result of his failure to be on duty, he will in all probability receive a term in prison. He leaves his victim unconscious beside the road and when a vessel is wrecked as the result of the failure of the light, organizes a posse to seek Jim and punish him for his neglect of duty. Through the efforts of Mary, however, the truth comes to light and Bill pays the penalty of his crime.

The film is highly dramatic from start to finish and is characterized throughout by its unusually rapid action. The shipwreck scenes are marvelously well handled, and the terrible disaster, the activities of the life-savers and the rescue of the unfortunate crew of the ill-fated vessel are depicted with startling realism.

"THE MASKED WRESTLER" (Essanay).

Probably Francis X. Bushman has never shown to better advantage in a photoplay, with the exception of "One Wonderful Night," than in the new two-act drama, "The Masked Wrestler," which is booked for release Friday, August 31. Mr. Bushman, who is an athlete as well as an actor, is given an unusual chance to display his physical perfection. Beverly Bayne, Bryant Washburn and Rapley Holmes also play excellent parts in this photoplay. The story hinges around Margery Winters, who falls in love with the Masked Wrestler, although she has never seen his face. Her cousin, Louis, is madly in love with her, but she spurns him for the mysterious athlete. The Masked Wrestler in an unusually thrilling match wins the championship of France. He unmasks and, lo and behold, he is none other than Louis, the spurned suitor. He takes Margery in his arms and all ends happily.

LINOTYPE IN TITLE WORK.

Following his usual practice of "going the other fellow one better," David Horsley has installed a linotype machine in the title department of the Centaur Film Company at Bayonne. This machine is the first to be adapted to motion picture work. It has four magazines and carries eight faces.

In addition to the machine is a complete job press. With such an equipment, all of the formerly difficult tricks of title work, such as reproductions of newspaper stories and matter in foreign languages, become easy, and by the same process artistic cards can be made up at a much lower cost than under the old scheme. Three new special lens cameras perfected by a new device invented by Mr. Horsley, have also been put in operation, completing the equipment of one of the biggest and most efficient title departments in the world.

DE MILLE REHEARSING LASKY PLAYERS.

The accompanying scene, from the studios of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, shows Cecil B. De Mille, director general of that organization, rehearsing Max Figman and Lolita Robertson, in a scene from George Barr McCutcheon's novel story, "What's His Name" which will be an early release of the Lasky Company through the Paramount Pictures Corporation.

Mr. De Mille Rehearsing Mr. Figman and Miss Robertson.

Mr. De Mille, deserted the legitimate drama about a year ago to assume the directorship of the Lasky Company, and his success in his new vocation has been both instantaneous and absolute.

For a year previous to entering the screen world, Mr. De Mille haunted the various Eastern studios, absorbing the knowledge required to fit him for his chosen field, and the forthcoming release of the Lasky Company, "The Call of The North," which is said to be the most artistic and impressive of any Lasky production, so far, was directed entirely by Mr. De Mille.

As a compliment to Mr. De Mille, the entire membership of the Lamb's Club will attend the first performance of "The Call of The North" at the Strand theater, next Sunday afternoon.

GABY DESLYS AT WORK FOR FAMOUS PLAYERS.

Gaby Deslys, the celebrated international star, whom President Zukor of the Famous Players engaged on the eve of her departure for Paris a few weeks ago for her first appearance in motion pictures, last week in London began work in an important feature for that concern. Gaby Deslys before sailing was very enthusiastic over her first film engagement; she was certain it would develop into one of the greatest features ever conceived for the screen. According to reports from London Gaby is moking unprecedented efforts to contribute her share to bring about this result.

The subject in which Gaby Deslys is to be presented to the motion picture public is an original conception written around the star, entitled "Her Triumph." Gaby is depicted as a member of the chorus and the sole support of her invalid mother and blind sister. She is an energetic worker and becomes the understudy of the part played by Mlle. Simonds, the leading lady. The latter, jealous through her belief that the leading man, Claude Devereaux, is in love with Gaby, tries to have her discharged, and when the manager refuses to do this she resigns. This gives Gaby the opportunity she has so long waited for, and she soons is acclaimed the greatest actress on the stage. Mlle. Simonde, watching her wonderful performance from a box, goes mad from envy and furv, and pulling a pistol from her bosom fires upon the stage. The bullet is deflected by her lover, Count Victor, and Claude escapes with but a small scratch. Overnight Gaby becomes the rage of the city, while Mlle. Simonde plans revenge and promises Victor to marry him if he succeeds in destroying Gaby's popularity. The story proceeds with many thrilling situations and stirring incidents, until after a strong climax the play culminates in "her triumph."

Harry Pilcer will also appear in the production, in support of Gaby. Gaby is to receive an unusual sum for her beauty and charm to the screen.

"NEW PHASE OF THE PICTURE BUSINESS."

A. Fox, recently connected with the Box Office Attractions Company, is now about to supply what is certainly a great need in the producing end of the business. He has upwards of 600 supers on hand ready for engagements at an hour's notice, which he is prepared to supply to any director and take the responsibility of supplying just those actors necessary for the parts they are to take. He will put all his heart into this proposition so as to gain the absolute confidence of the many companies and directors.

In addition to this Mr. Fox is acting for many of the studios as agent, undertaking the booking up of the studio. This is a very excellent idea from the owner's point of view, inasmuch as he may be able to rent a studio for probably sixteen hours a day. Mr. Fox's idea is to have a schedule of each studio, and if it is engaged on any particular day, from 11 A. M. to 5 P. M., he will be advised of this, and any company wishing to produce a certain specific scene, which would probably only take a matter of two hours. Mr. Fox will be in a position to advise the prospective producer that he could have this studio from 8 A. M. to 10:30 A. M., or, say, after 5 P. M. in the evening. All this means studios can become better equipped; every minute of time can be used up, and overhead charges of these studios will be proportionately reduced.

MISS LA BADIE MAKES SOME JUMP.

Florence La Badie, "the actress unafraid," performed last week the most difficult scene, actual risk of life considered, thus far attempted in a motion picture play. The scene is one of the thrillers in "The Million Dollar Mystery," Thanhouser's big serial. Miss La Badie escaped from a hydroplane, going at the rate of forty miles an hour and was then picked out of the water by James Cruze, her story hero, who arrives at the critical moment in a hydroeroplane.

The scene was taken at Shippan Point, near Stamford,

Flo La Badie Making a Dive.

Conn., the cottagers and summer residents turning out to witness the young girl's daring. Miss La Badie has probably more actual picture thrills to her credit than any leading woman on the screen. Asked as to the sensations she felt, as she hurled herself from the speeding hydroplane, Miss La Badie calmly commented: "I only remember I lost my breath when I struck the water. The rest of it was fine."

MANUEL KLEIN MUSIC FOR "THE NIGHTINGALE."

One of the most prominent features of the coming All Star Feature Corporation's production, "The Nightingale," in which the incomparable Ethel Barrymore makes her debut in motion pictures, is the musical score which has been compiled for accompaniment of the picture by Manuel Klein, the musical director and leader of the New York Hippodrome, whose compositions for all All Star productions are now becoming so well known.

Dealing as it does with the success of an Italian Street singer, leading her through avenues of success to the operatic stage, where she gains her laurels in the performance of "Aida," "The Nightingale" has presented to Mr. Klein inspiration for a most beautiful composition of incidental music which will be notable among his long list of accomplishments.

THE STANDARD'S CONCESSION AT PANAMA EXPOSITION.

Particulars regarding the concessions obtained by the Standard Film Corporation at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition have been received in New York. The matter was arranged by Stanley H. Twist, representing the Standard. A tract of ground approximating five acres and located on the main amusement street of the concession district has been secured. On this space a large and first-class theater will be erected and the best subjects will be secured for exhibition. On other parts of the ground will be located a huge ampitheater and producing studios to enable the public to see how motion pictures are made. A complete manufacturing plant will also be built where the pictures will be developed and printed and where visitors may, for a small fee, secure pictures in motion of themselves and families. The Standard already has camera men at work at the exposition grounds taking pictures of the present activities.

FIRST WAR PICTURES ANNOUNCED.

The Ramo Company makes an announcement in the advertising columns of the Moving Picture World this week to the effect that it has secured the first authentic pictures of events leading to the present war in Europe. The pictures are said to have been taken at Nancy on the French frontier and were expected to arrive by the S. S. New York on Sunday Aug. 9. This picture, with other pertinent subjects, will be incorporated into a big war feature to be released at once.

ECLECTIC BRANCH'S FINE PROJECTION ROOM.

Invitations were sent last week to a number of the exhibitors in Washington, D. C., to be present at the opening of the new exhibition room of the Eclectic Feature Film Exchange, which has recently entered the field in that city, taking offices in the Bank of Commerce and Savings Building, at Seventh and E streets Northwest. The room is fitted out in as complete a manner as any moving picture theatre in the city and is a novelty in itself. It will comfortably accommodate about twenty-five persons.

At one end is a specially prepared screen about 8 by 6 feet, on which films are projected by a Simplex motor-driven machine situated in a huge galvanized iron booth. The booth is somewhat out of proportion when compared with the remainder of the space, but this was required by existing laws covering moving picture theaters in that city. Around the screen is a large black border which sets off the former to advantage. The walls are blue in color, while the ceilings is a dead white. Several electric fans keep the room comfortably cool, while for winter there is the steam plant of the building to bring about the reverse. Two large display screens, one on each side of the room, contain pictures portraying scenes in films now being released, and a number of palms and cut flowers added to the attractiveness of the place. Those who accepted the invitation of C. L. Worthington, the local manager, were treated to an advance exhibition of a number of high-grade films including "A Royal Importer," in five reels, natural colors; a one-reel Pathe, "This Is the Life," and the sixth episode in the Perils of Pauline.

Notes From the Trade

THE newest Ford Sterling masterpiece has to do with the operations of an up-to-date suicide club. Ford is crossed in love and he decides that the only hope of surcease of his sorrow is in suicide. But he hasn't the nerve. He is ashamed of himself, but he is afraid to make his own quietus. This unpleasant duty, however, is taken off his hands. He joins a suicide club, and for a fee of $5 he is to be assassinated at 3 o'clock. At 2:30 o'clock the girl finds out she really loves him and the unhappy man is forced to break his suicide pact. The story was written and directed by David Kirkland. It is entitled "At 3 O'Clock."

Robert Leonard and his Rex (Universal) company, consisting of Harry Carter, Allen Forrest, Robert Chandler and Ella Hall, left Los Angeles on July 25 for Pine Crest, San Bernardino County, Cal., one of the most densely wooded districts in the United States. Mr. Leonard is taking this company into this lonesome locality for the production of one of his own dramas, entitled "The Mistress of Dark Wood Basin." It is a powerful backwoods story laid in a logging camp. Ella Hall will play the title role.

A motorboat proposal is the feature of "A Lesson in Mechanics," a one-reel comedy being produced by W. C. Cabanne, at the Reliance and Majestic Hollywood studios. How the timid lover screws up sufficient courage to propose to his sweetheart only after her features are concealed underneath a plentiful supply of oil is shown in this picture. Dorothy Gish and Robert Harron are the principals.

As proof of the tremendous popularity of Kleine-Cines actresses on the continent of Europe comes the news that in a recent popularity contest held by "Film," one of the leading motion picture journals on the other side of the Atlantic, six of the thirteen feminine players receiving the greatest number of votes were members of the Kleine-Cines organization. Of the three selected as most proficient in their art, two, Francesca Bertine and Lyda Borelli, appear exclusively in films marketed in America by George Kleine. The six Kleine-Cines players so signally honored by the European exhibitors and readers of Film are Francesca Bertini, Giovanna Terribilit, Olga Benetti, Leda Gys, Lyda Borelli and Pina Menichelli, all familiarly known to American picture fans.

Ben D. Crose, of the Empress Feature Film Company, of Indianapolis, left New York last Saturday after a few days' stay. The purpose of his visit was to confirm arrangements for the sale of exhibition rights in Indiana and Kentucky. Mr. Crose reports that demands for this first episode in the Webb Detective Series have been so heavy, partly because of the heavy advertising the feature has had, that it is probable that a second print will necessarily have to be imported into the territory within a few weeks.

George Field, who takes the part of the father in "Converting Dad," now being produced by Henry Otto, has a much different character to portray than usually falls to his lot. From the close-fisted old farmer, who considers it a waste of money to spend it on education, to the proud parent who welcomes back his son after he has attained success in the electrical field, is certainly somewhat different to playing heavies.

Directors of motion pictures have long known that the little touch of a child in a picture is often more effective than the most finished art of a great actor. Henry McRae of the Universal has employed this knowledge to remarkable advantage in his most recent production, "The Half-Breed."

Miss Vivian Rich and "Billy" Garwood have splendid parts in the American's two-reel subject, "The Aftermath." "Billy" takes the part of the young labor leader who later on takes the blame for the killing of the man who tries to adjust the differences between the forces of capital and labor. His mother, believing this man to be a burglar, shoots and kills him. It is a strong dramatic part, full of action. Vivian Rich in the character of the sister has a part that is especially suited to her versatility and dramatic ability. Harry Von Meter as the father of the young labor leader and Jack Richardson as the son of the capitalist have both strong parts.

He said the Eclair artist was playing leading parts in six different scenarios in course of production, and that if an accident should disable him the pictures would be ruined, entailing a loss of at least $7,000.

It is ascertained that Bessie Learn, the leading ingenue of the Edison company, who has been traveling through Europe for the past two months, is experiencing great difficulty in booking passage back to America on acount of the present state of European affairs. Every effort will be made at this end on the part of the Edison company in enabling Miss Learn to return to the States via the quickest route.

Abraham Potiker of Cleveland, who recently returned from Austria-Hungary, has received word from the Austrian Consul to report to Austria for military duty. He received this mandate despite the rumpus raised at the time of Potiker's visit to his old home town about five weeks ago, when he was taken to the lock-up, charged with the crime of attempting to escape military duty by fleeing to America. Potiker proved his citizenship, however, and was freed. Potiker will not respond to the mother country's call to arms.

To have two huge railroad locomotives crash headlong into each other at a speed of forty miles an hour will be a feature of a big Labor Day celebration to be held at Philipsburg, Pa., according to the plans which are now under way. The scene for the collision will be staged on the Pittsburgh and Susquehanna railroad at a point between Moshannon and Sterling, two towns near Philipsburg. The event is being arranged for the benefit of the Lubin Company, which in order to get realistic moving pictures of a railway crash is said to have entered into a contract with the railway people to have the "wreck" pulled off. It is the purpose to show the collision in moving pictures.

PITTSBURGH.

JOHN BOWER, auditor of the Pittsburgh branch of the General Film Company, gave a picnic recently to all the employees of that company. The picnic grove was none other than Mr. Bowers beautiful farm in the South Hills, near Pittsburgh, and about seventy-five guests were present. The outing included all the athletic sports usually found at such affairs and then some. Lunch, of course, was a big factor, but must be passed over as indescribable, since no artist can paint the wonderful relish of that board to those hungry picnickers and the genial atmosphere that enveloped them. This much though can be said of the food: Nearly every article was guaranteed strictly fresh from Bower's farm. After lunch came the crowning feature of the day. A large curtain was stretched on Bower's house and a moving picture machine erected about twenty-five yards distant. The guests gathered around preparatory to enjoying a good bill of pictures, while at the same time determined to benefit by the pure air for which Bower's place is noted. No! Mr. Bower does not intend to run for a political office. It was only his esteem for his fellow men that prompted this act but he sure is "in solid" with those employees of the General Film Company.

There is a persistent rumor floating about moving picture quarters here that a deal is being consummated which will involve the exchange of the well-known Cameraphone theater, situated on Fifth avenue, in the downtown section of Pittsburgh. This report is causing much comment among motion picture men as the Cameraphone is one of the best and largest moving picture houses in the city. Ira Aronson, a local realty broker, is the reputed purchaser, and the rumor has it that he will give the theater his personal supervision. The terms of the deal will not be made known before August 1, when it is said the transfer will be made. Mr. Beatty, the present manager, still retains his interest and will continue to direct the other Cameraphone theaters.

A new motion picture theater has been opened lately in Hooversville, Pa. The theater is up to date in its equipments and is under the management of Thomas Crissey and David Jonothan.

The Nixon theater, a moving picture concern of Tarentum, Pa., which was closed for some time pending repairs to machinery and the remodeling of the interior, is now open for business.

The Fort Pitt Film Company, Pittsburgh, Pa., was granted a state charter. The capital was given as $5,000. The incorporators are Louis Schick, Philip Selling and J. B. Felber.

C. E. Hoover has leased a building at 112 East Ohio street, Pitttsburgh, for a number of years. Mr. Hoover intends to install on the first floor a moving picture theater.

Mayer Silverman, proprietor of the Liberty Film Company, has issued invitations to exhibitors first to select a date for his firm's proposed demonstration banquen, then to attend. While Mr. Silverman's affair is calculated to atttract business it will also furnish much pleasant diversion to the exhibitors and will probably be received joyfully.

An important victory was won by the Pittsburgh exhibitors this week when the city authorities, at the demand of the local motion picure men, ordered the free moving picture shows in the parks and playgrounds to be discontinued. When the playgrounds were opened this summer arrangements were made by the officers in charge of the open-air parks to provide free moving pictures. Projection machines and screens were installed in the playground and an extensive program of pictures were given each day. These free attractions gathered huge crowds of people and succeeded in putting a decided "crimp" in the business of regular exhibitors. The fact that the local exhibitors pay a high license tax to operate here made the free shows particularly objectionable, and at a recent meeting of the exhibitors a committee was named to call upon the mayor and protest against the continued showing of the free pictures. As the mayor was absent, the committee called upon Councilman Garland and stated their grievances. Mr. Garland was quick to see the disadvantage the local exhibitors were being placed under and at a special meeting of council brought up the question. The matter was quickly adjusted and the free pictures were ordered discontinued. According to the statements of members of committee the free shows provided by the city were making heavy inroads on the receipts of the local exhibitors. Admission to the playgrounds is free and naturally patrons of the theaters shifted their presence from the motion picture houses to the playgrounds. In view of the fact that the motion picture men pay an extremely high license for the privilege of operating in this city there was but one course open to the city authorities, and, despite the protests of a number of people who hate to pay for their amusement, the city was eliminated as a competitor with the Pittsburgh motion picture men.

Joseph B. Ross is the newly installed manager of the Manor Theater at Irwin, Pa.

The Band Theater at Mt. Union, Pa., which has been closed for some time, has been reopened.

William Ray will erect two brilliant curb lights in front of his motion picture theater at New Castle, Pa. Mr. Ray secured permission from the city authorities for erecting the extra lights, and the theater will now have one of the most brilliant locations in the city.

Citizens of the towns along the Norfolk and Western Railroad in McDowell county, W. Va., have appealed to Prosecuting Attorney F. C. Cook for permission to have the motion picture theaters of that district open on Sundays, it being asserted that the people have nothing else to do to amuse themselves on Sunday and that the attendance at the theaters will have a tendency to prevent the young people from engaging in mischievous pursuits. The question was put up to Attorney-General Lilly in the form of a letter from the prosecuting attorney asking the advice of the attorney-general office and the answer was made that the Sunday statute, strictly construed, would not permit of the operation of places of amusement. An interesting feature of the opinion, however, is the observation of Mr. Lilly that in several cities and towns of the state many things are permitted on Sunday, which, if a rigid observance of the laws were insisted upon, would be prohibited. Among those mentioned are the opening on Sunday of drug stores, fruit stores, cigar stands and places in which soft drinks are sold. It is also observed that under the law the prosecuting attorney being charged with the criminal business of the county may be vested with a discretion as to the prosecution of cases, where, in the opinion of the prosecutor, a rigid enforcement of the law would work a hardship on the community in general. This latter observation, in view of the fact that the prosecuting attorney seems to favor the petition of the citizens, would tend to indicate that Sunday exhibitions will prevail throughout the district in which they are desired.

Judge Thomas J. Ford has set August 31 as the date for the public sale of the assets of the Pitt Theater Company, of Pittsburgh. A sale was requested by J. Frank McHenry, who was named receiver. After taking the theater over and conducting it for two weeks, Mr. McHenry reported to the court he deemed it unprofitable to continue business longer. The theater has been exhibiting feature films for some time. The essets of the company are placed at $5,311.30 and the liabilities at $46,891.82.

The United States Steel Corporation is arranging to have motion pictures taken of the big plants here in Pittsburgh and of the surrounding grounds. At McKeesport, where one of the largest of the buildings is situated, the steel company will have the playgrounds, the bathing pools, etc., built for the convenience of employees, filmed and displayed throughout the country. One of the purposes for taking the pictures is to attract workingmen and their families to Pittsburgh. One print of the films will be preserved as a record. MANLEY.

INDIANA.

HOW a man who doesn't know the moving picture business can make a success of a theater where men of experience have failed, has been demonstrated by Otto N. Moore, manager of the Irving theater, in the Indianapolis suburb, Irvington. "He may not know the picture business so well as some, but he knows Irvington," is the way one man has put it. Two other exhibitors have tried the Irving and found it did not draw well for them. Moore is the third. The second owner failed through the fact that he put in a Sunday show. The Irvingtonites are a church population in a large majority. The college is a church organization. The church people of the suburb put the quietus on Sunday baseball, the theater gave a Sunday picture exhibition, resolutions condemning the action were passed in all the churches, and it was thought the management would take heed and be good, but the show was on the next Sunday as usual. The population then adopted more effective tactics. They stayed away during the week. The house was closed for a time, but the territory is unoccupied and is undoubtedly good, so Moore came.

Moore's success was not instantaneous, but has been growing steadily, and is due to advertising. He had no means of advertising except by his bulletin board and handbills, which he is using effectively. Moore's handbill is not the ordinary handbill. Irvingtonites would not have been interested in the cheap paper, bold type, kind of advertising, so Moore chose the kind that would interest them. The result is a totally different kind of handbill. It is a neat handbill, printed on smooth white stock, and in size only a little larger than a postcard. It has oddity, refinement and punch. For Moore's particular purpose, the winning of the Irvington branch of citizen as patrons, his advertising is hard to beat. It is advertising that fits, and the growing crowds at Moore's theater, are proof that it pulls.

The Indianapolis exhibitors recently held a meeting to determine what should be done about the action of the Chamber of Commerce and Church Federation, but could not decide upon a plan of action. The Chamber and the Federation went to Mayor Bell with a request that he discontinue handling the charity fund created by the city exhibitors donations from Sunday charity shows. The two bodies said that for the time being they would have nothing to say regarding the closing of Sunday shows, a statement which the exhibitors have taken as advance notice of trouble to come. Under the administration of former Mayor Shank, now in vaudeville, the exhibitors supplied $25 a week to the Mayor's office to be used for charitable purposes. The rest of the charity fund was dispensed by the German Ladies' Aid Society, the Indianapolis Humane Society, and the Flower Mission Hospital Society.

When Mayor Bell came into office he would not accept the $25 donation for dispensation through his office—a fund which Mayor Shank used to buy tickets to all kinds of charity benefits, in gifts to brides he married, and for the promotion generally of Shank publicity. Mayor Bell held that he had no right to accept it, and that the city's position in the matter must be that of absolute control or non-recognition. The net result of the controversy was that the city took control. Now the Chamber and the Church Federation think the city should let go, and the interest the picture men take in the situation is that whatever happens is likely to imperil Sunday business. By donating a portion of the receipts to charity each Sunday, the exhibitors maintain they are "within the law" in keeping open. They feel they are safe, but feel uneasy and are unable to determine whether there is anything to do but stand pat.

Charles Bivins, former manager of the Crescent, Bloomington, is to erect an airdome at Fourth and Walnut streets. It is Mr. Bivins plan to arrange the property for the accommodation of crowds both winter and summer. S. D. Fair is associated with Mr. Bivins.

The Waterloo Press, Waterloo, thinks the moving picture film men should give the people more of what they should have in the way of entertainment, and less of what they want. He believes that what the people want is not very often good for them.

Mayor Fred W. Keller, South Bend, announces that after four months' study of the subject he is of the opinion there should be censorship of public amusements, particularly moving pictures. He has named a committee for that purpose which includes U. G. Manning, city controller; Mrs. L. S. Fickenisher, Lenn J. Oare, Miss Bertha Adelsperger, A. J. Tylavsky and Aaron Jones. Mr. Jones is a moving picture exhibitor, named to represent the exhibitors. The committee will serve without pay.

The motion picture drama "Creation" was shown at Athletic Park in Kokomo, to practically the entire population, great interest being aroused in the film.

Matt Lindsley, Charles Sewell and Tom Brown have bought the Photo Dome, Columbus, of R. W. Danvant of Edinburg, Ind. It is a co-operative ownership, Lindsley being the machine operator, Sewell at the piano and Brown on the door.

Charles Geary has leased the Star theater to Frank Beaty and the Montpelier theater will be run by Mr. Beaty for six weeks while Mr. Geary and his wife take a vacation.

Arthur Coleman and J. W. Peck, Greensburg men, have copyrighted a new stunt for moving picture houses, which they call "Silhouette Slides." Ten pictures of well known men about town are run and slips are handed out to the audience upon which they may write the names of the men. Those naming the ten receive $1. Ten are put on each night. The one guessing the greatest number through the week receives a prize of $10.

Harry Tutewiler, commissioner of playgrounds, Indianapolis, is putting on a free moving picture show at the city's free bathing pools one night the pools have to be cleaned in order to furnish the crowds that regularly gather some entertainment. The picture machine outfit is readily portable.

The Luna-Lite Theater, Marion, has been turned over to the Marion Normal Institute for one night, when a benefit show will be given.

Covington merchants find the free moving picture show on the public square once a week a good advertising scheme for bringing trade to their stores. Good crowds have attended every open-air show so far and it is proposed to keep the plan going until the weather cuts down attendance.

The Liberty Theater Company of East Chicago has been incorporated for $5,000. Morris Brennan is president.

The Elwood moving picture exhibitors have formed an organization to test the Sunday law. One of the theaters will be opened. An Indianapolis attorney has assured the exhibitors that he can obtain their acquittal. The plan it is understood is similar to that employed by the Indianapolis exhibitors for "keeping within the law."

Manager Harrigan of the Grand at Newcastle has added a Saturday night vaudeville attraction and made the price ten cents.

The Terre Haute houses did a capacity business during the week of the Uniform Rank Knights of Pythias encampment there.

Manager Mike Maas, who has had the Dreamland Theater, Mt. Vernon, closed for interior decorations, announces he will open August 1 with Lucille Love.

Manager A. F. Gravel, Goodland, found the women turning out strong in answer to his advertisement offering a Mutual Girl Magazine and dress pattern to all attending a certain show at his house.

"Wonderland News" is the title given the daily within a daily which Manager L. A. Horney is printing as advertising in the Daily Clintonian, Clinton. There is something of the program, the actors, and occasionally items about the house, such as notice of the installation of a sanitary drinking fountain and a new machine.

The fixtures of the Tokyo theater, Logansport, brought $400 at a separate sale held by thd receiver, John Flannigan, who proposes to open an airdome, bought the seats for $95 and the machine for $80.

Manager Tally opened the Empire airdome at Dillsboro to better than capacity audiences. He can seat 600. The admission is five and ten cents.

The Alhambra, Shelbyville, has added a bartola musical instrument, and Manager Rambusch believes it will add greatly to the attractiveness of his entertainment. The instrument imitates every known musical sound, including the brass band.

The Princess Theater, Boswell, will be opened on August 1. Manager J. O. Smith built the house at a cost of several thousand dollars. He has no competition in Boswell, and feels confident he will succeed.

The Novelty Theater, Evansville, has installed chimes and is now running Warner first run features.

PHILADELPHIA.

CONSIDERABLE interest is being shown by the local trade over the special efforts being expended by the new Department of Labor and Industry to secure information of the relative conditions existing in the moving picture trade in the state of Pennsylvania both in regard to labor and industry and which information is intended to aid the department in its plans to submit to the coming State legislature proposals for legislation which will be uplifting to the trade rather than detrimental to both elements: labor and industry.

The new theater of the state institution for the feeble minded at Polk, Pa., was officially opened by an inspection Wednesday, July 16, by the officials of the institution, members of the Board of Trustees, and the architect, S. D. Brady, of Franklin, Pa. The building was found to be satisfactory in every respect, and is an attractive addition to the handsome group of buildings which compose the institution.

The motion picture men throughout this city are busy at present organizing the "Reel Fellows Club of Philadelphia," an association of scenario writers and theater managers. Later membership will be open to all Pennsylvania motion picture men. James Emmanuel, of the Ridge Amusement Company, will act as temporary secretary.

One of the more recent additions to the roster of the moving picture exchanges in this city is the Comedy Film Service Company, situated at 1134 Vine street. The new company will buy only one reel split comedies. The manager of the firm, Edward A. Yheanlon, was for many years in the real estate business in this city handling nothing but moving picture houses, while the junior partner of the company, George Gorman, was for a number of years business agent for the Operators Union, and an operator for about fifteen years.

To prevent the construction of a moving picture theater at 220 North Broad street, this city, Adolph Mark, an adjoining property owner, began suit on July 14, against Kahn & Greenberg, the builders. Mark avers that the original deed to the property obtained by Kahn & Greenberg contains a proviso that neither the property nor the grounds shall be used for any "offensive occupation." The complainant contends that a moving picture theater constitutes "offensive occupation."

Plans are in progress by Leroy B. Rothschild, architect, for the erection of a moving picture house in Girard avenue, this city. The new addition to the trade will be a one-story brick and terra cotta structure and fireproof throughout, with a seating capacity of 500.

Industrial education by moving pictures, the exhibition of which will be as free as the air to all those who want a better insight into the production of things to eat and wear, or which otherwise enter into life's necessities and comforts, is to be furnished by the Bureau of Commercial Economics whose office has just been established in Philadelphia. By means of motion pictures the various stages of manufacture in many lines of industry will be portrayed. Francis Holley, Director of the Bureau of Commercial Economics, describes it as an association of manufacturers, producers and transportation lines in this country and abroad to engage in disseminating industrial and vocational informaton. The secrets of every phase of agriculture, mining and smelting ores, and the entire gamut of the animal industry are to be illustrated by motion pictures. The making of clothing from shearing the sheep and picking the cotton through the carding, or combing and ginning processes, to the finished product will be shown. The reels and slides are to be displayed in universities, colleges, schools, public institutions, settlement houses, missions, commercial clubs and at trade conventions and county fairs. Two experimental automobiles are being equipped with motion picture machines and stereopticons of the dissolving picture for service in parks and playgrounds. Explanatory slides are in five languages. Films are to be supplied by owners of industrial establishments who are willing to contribute them. "Under no circumstances will we show a picture for money," Director Holley says. "It will be shown on its merits, and if it discloses where it has been taken, well and good, for due credit will be given somewhere to all who assist in the work."

CONGDON.

NORTHWESTERN NEW YORK.

THE Academy theater, Buffalo, which showed only moving pictures during the first part of the summer, has now returned to vaudeville. M. B. Schlesinger, manager, has returned from a three-weeks' fishing trip in Maine. Some pictures will be continued at this house.

The Model Theater Co. will build a brick moving picture theater at 149 East Genesee street, Buffalo, at a cost of $40,000.

A film showing the proper care of the teeth was recently prepared by the Rochester Moving Picture Co.

The new People's theater, Binghamton, has been opened by A. W. Newman.

Charles Bowe, manager of the Frontier moving picture theater, Buffalo, recently had charge of the candy booth at a local church fete. His successful spieling attracted much business.

A Keith vaudeville theater, seating 2,800 persons, will be erected on the Wheldon property on South Salina street, Syracuse. It is expected the house will be ready in about a year. The Keith interests during the coming year will also erect a moving picture theater in that city. The capacity will be about 2,000. The site of this house has not been announced.

A report from Binghamton says that the Symphony Theater Co. has obtained a temporary injunction restraining Mayor William R. Ely and the Police Department from closing the Symphony and Star theaters of that city for moving pictures on Sunday.

The Happy Hour Amusement Co. will improve the Majestic theater, Elmira. The stage will be enlarged and nearly 600 additional seats provided.

Under the auspices of the publicity committee of the Syracuse Chamber of Commerce about 1,100 feet of moving picture films of that city and of the Municipal day parade and crowds there were taken recently.

The Shero Photo Players and Camera Exchange Co., capitalized at $25,000, has been incorporated in Rochester. The directors are James Shero, Charles M. Rowe and Jesse P. Willard of that city.

G. B. Schlesinger has been appointed manager of the New Lyric theater, Buffalo, which formerly played moving pictures and vaudeville. The house will open the season with the Mabel Brownell and Clifford Stock Co. His brother, M. B. Schlesinger, is now manager of the Academy. The New Lyric will be repainted and redecorated for the opening.

H. E. Benedict, booker for the General Film Co., Buffalo, was recently married to Miss Clair G. Stewart of that city.

Daniel Pantalone will erect a moving picture theater at 16 East Erie avenue, Corning. The house will seat 1,400 persons.

The management of the Colonial theater, Elmira, recently won a victory in police court, when a jury that heard the case of Patrick Casseta, an Italian, against Archie G. McCallum, resident manager of the Colonial theater, a verdict of not guilty. Casseta charged that McCallum, as manager of the theater, discriminated against him in refusing him a ticket for the first floor seats on June 30. It was maintained by attorneys for the defense that the manager had the right to place his patrons in any part of the theater he pleased, inasmuch as there were no reserved seats. The Italians who alleged discrimination were offered seats on the second floor, but refused to take them in preference to the first floor seats.

BILLY BISON.

BUFFALO.

A special display consisting of Japanese lanterns, flowers, flags and fans attracted much attention in the lobby of the Strand theater, Buffalo, recently. These decorations were used by Manager Edel of that house to advertise the Japanese moving picture feature, "The Wrath of the Gods." The waters in the fountain in the lobby contained Japanese perfumes. Much money was also spent for special stage effects for the production. There was appropriate orchestra music.

Manager M. B. Schlesinger of the Academy theater, Buffalo, recently admitted boys and girls to the theater on receipt of fifty swatted flies. He also offered a season ticket for the child bringing in the most flies. Mina McKee, seven years old, of that city, jumped ahead of all the other contestants with a box containing more than 10,000 flies.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

UNCLE SAM'S JACKIES on the ships now stationed in Mexican waters are having real picture shows all of their own, for on several of the battleships projection machines have been installed and nightly exhibitions are given. Among the reels shown are several showing the soldiers and bluejackets "mixing" it up in Vera Cruz, and these are extremely popular.

It is reported that the government of Brazil is seriously contemplating erecting a building in this city for permanent exhibition purposes. In this connection it is planned to use motion pictures in showing life in Brazil, its social life, sports, the harvesting of crops, especially of coffee, and other features of every day life in the cities and country.

Although there is a lot of grumbling to be heard, it is remarkable the way business has kept up in the heated months. Comparatively few of the theatres have closed for the summer and the probability is that with the many improvements being made to the houses here, in future years the business will be good twelve months in the year. More attention is being paid to the cooling of the houses by artificial means and the time will come when people will haunt the moving picture houses to get away from the intense heat of the streets, and even of their own homes.

E. W. Booth, formerly with the George Kleine productions, is now with the Eclectic Feature Film Company, as is also Mr. Osborn, formerly with the General Film Exchange, of this city. Ira Moore, who is in charge of the operating department at the New Masonic Moving Picture theatre, will preside over the shipping department for this concern. The office force is now comprised of two young ladies, with the probability of an increase if present business continues.

Alexander G. Irvine, with the World Film Corporation, at 811 E street, Northwest, recently joined the ranks of the benedicts and is due for considerable congratulation. His bride was Miss Grace Collins, of Germantown, Md. Mr. Irvine is about to leave for a business trip through North Carolina, Virginia and Tennessee and upon his return, with Mrs. Irvine will spend several weeks in New York, Atlantic City, and on a trip up the St. Lawrence River and among the Thousand Islands.

Mr. William Irvine, of the same corporation, has just returned from a trip through the southern territory and reports good business.

The new moving picture theatre being erected on Broad street, Richmond, Va., for S. L. Hofheimer will soon be ready for occupancy.

A. Dresner, the genial manager of the Washington Film Exchange, is taking life easy along the Boardwalk, in Atlantic City. In his absence, Paul D. Irvin, from the Philadelphia office, is presiding over the destinies of the local branch.

C. L. LINRY.

CINCINNATI.

RECENT improvement in the kind of weather being handed out in this vicinity has been decidedly beneficial to local exhibitors, as business naturally suffered considerably during the torridity of early July. Lately, however, with somewhat more moderate temperatures, the attendance at most of the houses has picked up perceptibly, especially at those where good ventilation and plenty of fans give reasonable ground for the claim that they are cooler than the streets.

The big five-reel production of Klaw & Erlanger's success, "Classmates," which was shown some weeks ago to large houses at the Gayety, before that house closed for the summer, came back in every sense of the word on a recent Sunday at the Orpheum, where many people who had not had an opportunity to see it in the downtown house took advange of the chance to take it in at the hill-top theater.

"Neptune's Daughter," a big six-reel Universal production in which Annette Kellermann is featured, was the attraction last week at Keith's theater, large audiences being the rule throughout the week to see the various noteworthy features of the ocean drama. Miss Kellermann's popularity and the extent to which she is known, as well as the amount of newspaper space which has been devoted to the production itself, made it a big drawing-card with the vaudeville house, and the week's run proved none too long for it.

McMahan & Jackson, well-known theatrical and motion-picture men in Cincinnati, who sometime ago started the Independent Features Co., which they have since operated with considerable success, have finally cut loose entirely from their burlesque interests, and will hereafter devote their attention to the photoplay end of the business. They recently disposed of their interest in the Olympic theater, a local burlesque house, to the Progressive Burlesque Co., of New York, making an offer, in response to a request, which was accepted. It is understood that the amount involved was something like $20,000. It is announced, in this connection, that McMahan & Jackson will control "Neptune's Daughter" exclusively in Ohio.

A real "movie romance," as the papers insisted on calling it, is embodied in the recent marriage of Elson L. Umstead, chief operator at the Majestic moving picture theater in Springfield, O., to Miss Goldie Redding, of the same city. The couple met at a reception just three days before they were married, developing a mutual attraction which ended in the wedding. Umstead is 21 years of age, while his bride is only 18.

The manner in which the church has gone from tacit and then open approval of moving pictures as an amusement to the more advanced attitude of exhibiting them itself was again illustrated in Cincinnati last week by the fact that in connection with the fair held by the Church of the Holy Cross a regular picture show was held, at which the program was changed daily and an admission of five cents was charged.

Clarence E. Runey, the popular moving picture photographer, is finding his services in almost daily demand by one organization or another which desires to make a permanent living record of its outings, the most recent of these engagements being that of the military company of the Lodge of Moose, to be held at Chester Park on Augst 15. Knowing the extent to which the services of Mr. Runey are called for, the lodge took the precaution of engaging him well in advance, with sufficient on the program to keep him busy for the full day. It is proposed to take several hundred feet of the prize drill which will be given, as well as of a bathers' drill which will be held, a baby show, and other features of the occasion.

Th outing of the Larkin Soap Clubs in the section around Youngstown, O., which was attended by fully 2,500 persons at Idora Park last week, was marked by an unusually interesting exhibit of motion pictures by a representative of the company from Buffalo, showing views of the big plant and the manufacturing methods of the company, thus strengthening the bond between the company and its customers.

The Scenic, at Portsmouth, recently installed a new Simplex machine, Charles Reed, of the Columbus Theater Equipment Co., which sold the machine, coming down to install it. While in Portsmouth he seized the opportunity to do a little more business, disposing of a second machine to Rudolph Kountz, of New Boston, who is erecting a new picture theater. Mr. Reed has been having excellent business in this territory with the Simplex.

The Dayton Herald, of Dayton, O., has found a method of stimulating interest in the want ads. which it prints by appealing to the general interest in moving pictures. Every day it prints through the want ad. columns the names of twenty-seven people, taken from the city directory, who are entitled on application to two moving picture theater tickets, good any day except Sunday. An arrangement has been entered into by the paper with a number of leading exhibitors in the city for this purpose, including the South Park, the Midgets, the Empress, the Museum, the Wayne, the Edgemont, the Family, the Alhambra and the Mirror, and it seems to be working out to the entire success of all concerned.

The motion pictures of the fight between Johnny Griffith and Jack Britton, held in Canton, O., on July 4, have become the bone of contention between several interested parties, and Deputy Sheriff George Ferguson has accordingly been appointed receiver of the film until the controversy can be settled, this appearing to be the only method of keeping matters in statu quo for that period. Suit was filed at Akron by "Pop" Griffith against Richard A. White, of the Ohio Motion Picture Co., by whom the films were made, alleging that under the terms of a verbal contract made July 1, Griffith was to receive one-third of the net proceeds of the pictures, another one-third being stipulated for the McKinney Athletic Club Co., of Canton, under whose auspices the fight was held. Griffith now charges in his suit that White has failed to observe this alleged contract, and has paid no part of the large sum which he is said to have earned by showing the pictures in Akron, Canton and Barberton, O. Arthur B. Nice, a Barberton exhibitor, is made a party to the suit, being enjoined from paying over to White any part of the proceeds secured from an exhibition of the pictures or from re-delivering the film to White.

The Pekin Theater Co., recently incorporated in Dayton, O., by Irene Wheeler, R. L. Farrow, W. B. Johnson, J. J. Wheeler and Benjamin Wheeler, with a capital stock of $1,000, intends to construct and operate a picture house in that city, and is making arrangements for its building and equipment.

The Wonderland theater, of Marion, O., has been sold by John J. Hablitzel, who has operated it for about a year, to Frank Weaver. Mr. Weaver has been associated in the management of the theater with Mr. Hablitzel for some time, and is well acquainted with the business. He has assumed complete charge of the details of the management now, and expects to keep things moving nicely.

The Lubin, of Cincinnati, is utilizing its billboards and other advertising space in telling the public of the consolidation of big picture interests whose productions are labeled as "Paramount Pictures." These include the Daniel and Charles Frohman productions, and those of Belasco, Lasky, Bosworth, the Famous Players, and others, and promise a feast of good things for the numerous patrons of the Lubin and of other houses who will show these films.

The five-reel Kalem production of "Wolfe, or the Conquest of Quebec," was a Sunday feature at the Orpheum, in Walnut Hills, Cincinnati, last week, and drew capacity houses, especially on the roof, which continues to grow in popularity. The weather has been pleasant and moderate for the past week, but there are few evenings when the breeze which is always to be found on the top of the Orpheum is not agreeable, and the management has profited accordingly.

The Victoria, Cincinnati, received the last of the "Adventures of Kathlyn" in its turn on Friday night of last week, good houses turning out to bid the popular Selig heroine farewell until her reappearance in other thrilling animal adventures.

A more or less serious strike by the Cincinnati local union of the Moving Picture Projecting Machine Operators was threatened last week, when the organization insisted on the acceptance of the new wage scale decided upon by it several weeks ago, which went into effect recently. The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League refused to indorse the scale as an organization, leaving the matter to the determination of the various individual exhibitors each for himself. This decision was arrived at after a debate which threatened to split the organization, the division being between the large and the small houses. The trouble ended, however, when practically every exhibitor in the city, as it is understood, agreed to the new scale, and there was consequently no break in any exhibitor's program due to friction with operators. The new scale, as heretofore reported in these columns, calls for an increase in wages for operators of from $1.50 to $3.50 a week.

On Saturday evening of last week the motion picture season at the Lyric theater, Cincinnati, which has been in fairly successful progress ever since the close of this regular theatrical season, came to an end, this house, like the Gayety, being turned over to the decorators and renovators to be fitted for the coming season's activities. Paul Hillman, who has been in charge of the motion picture season, with Jasper Orr, is the box office man at the Lyric during the regular season, and will officiate in that capacity in the fall. Following the closing of the house he and Mrs. Hillman left for a trip to New York.

Motion pictures are becoming a fixed part of every entertainment of any sort around Cincinnati, especially in meetings of business men. At the recent "Sommernachtsfest," held by the Business Men's Club on the roof of the Ohio Mechanics' Institute, which was attended by about 600 persons, a highly appreciated part of the entertainment was that afforded by a selection of several reels showing the recent activities of the club and other Cincinnati business organizations, as well as some comedy reels.

The Majestic theater, Dayton, O., made a hit with its patrons last week when it showed for the first time in that city, "The Eagle's Mate," featuring Mary Pickford, who is probably the most popular of the film stars in Dayton as well as in other parts of Ohio. This Famous Players release is not only up to the high standard set by the Former productions in scenic effect and other details, but seems to suit Miss Pickford herself remarkably well, judging from the enthusiasm reported on the part of Majestic audiences by the management.

The attendance at the Family, of Cincinnati, continues excellent, having taken a decided spurt during the past week of favoring weather, according to Manager Lipson. The interest in the Pathe Weekly, always a big drawing card, is greater than ever now that every week's issue is looked to as containing pictures of interest in connection with the war news in the four corners of the earth, and indications are that the first run of the weekly will be one of the biggest assets of the house during the remainder of the summer as well as afterward.

The Columbia, one of Dayton's leading houses, showed its patrons one of the season's hits on two days of last week, presenting Francis X. Bushman in the Essanay production, "One Wonderful Night," which is the four-reel drama in which Mr. Bushman is featured as the winner of the popularity contest conducted last year by the "Ladies' World." Louis Tracy's story has been worked out into a fine film production and in combination with the popular star drew splendidly at Dayton. The production has not yet appeared in Cincinnati.

An accident which might have had fatal results occurred recently at Ironton, Ohio, when the concrete floor of the Scenic theater gave way, due to some unknown cause, slightly injuring Russell Clere, an employe of the house, who was the only person around at the time. The house has been doing an excellent summer business with vaudeville and motion pictures, and Manager Hunter has been congratulating himself on his luck and the general good fortune of his patrons in the fact that the collapse of the floor occurred when the house was empty. About 150 seats were precipitated a distance downward of about fifteen feet, and serious injuries would undoubtedly have resulted had they been occupied at the time. The damage will be repaired immediately, and the floor so strengthened that a recurrence of the accident will be impossible.

Plans are under way at Springfield, O., for the construction of a motion picture theater which will cost $100,000, and will be one of the finest in the state. Architect William F. Miller, of Springfield, announces that he has been employed by a New York syndicate which is interested, to draw the plans and make arrangements for the construction of the house, and he is now busily at work on this commission. No location has as yet been secured, but it is understood that options have been taken on a number of possible sites in the business district of the city, any of which would be suitable for the purpose, and a deal for one of them will be closed within a few weeks.

Jerome B. Courliss, of Springfield, a faithful attendant on and student of motion picture plays, is benefiting by his interest in the films in his success as a photo-playwright, according to reports from that city. Mr. Courliss has sold a number of scenarios and stated recently that he has disposed of two others, one to the Solax Film Company and the other to the Sid Olcott organization. Springfield exhibitors intend to make a special effort to secure the productions for exhibition as soon as they are released, in order to take advantage of the interest in home talent.

Albert Pretzinger, of Dayton, Ohio, has charge of the project to make 10,000 feet of motion pictures of various Ohio cities for exhibition at the Ohio building at the Panama-Pacific exposition next year, and is receiving bids from various film companies for handling the work. All of the principal cities, points of interest and industries in the State will be represented, as far as possible, and it is expected that the amount of film indicated will be crowded with interest. Mr. Pretzinger is the architect in charge of the construction of the Ohio building at the exposition, and accepted the duty of arranging for the picture as an incident to that work.

The Interstate Theaters Company, recently incorporated at Canton, O., with a capital stock of $25,000, plans to construct a handsome and up-to-date motion picture theater in that city. Those interested, according to the articles of incorporation, are Robert Hall, Raymond Haggard, Walter Geltz, William H. Whitmer and Harry J. Reeder.

May's Opera house, in Piqua, O., was the scene of a panic last week during the presentation of a moving picture program which might have been serious. A reel caught fire while being run, and the operator, in attempting to carry it into the street fell, and the audience caught sight of the flames, with the natural consequence that a rush for the exits ensued. Many women and children fell, and several of them were trampled, but men in the audience managed to stem the rush and to quiet the audience down without serious consequences to anybody.

The management of the Clifford theater, in Urbana, O., is extremely proud of the new Wurlitzer orchestrion and organ recently installed, the instrument being the one which was installed in the exhibition hall in Dayton for demonstration purposes during the recent convention of the national exhibitors' organization. The orchestrion combines the effects of twenty-five different instruments, besides having various accessories, especially designed for use in connection with motion picture exhibitions, to imitate the sound of horses, trains, automobiles, telegraph keys and the like. The Rudolph Wurlitzer Company's expert player and demonstrator came up to Urbana to supervise the installation of the machine, and remained to show its possibilities to the evening audience at the Clifford, which was delighted with the program offered.

The management of the Majestic and Princess theaters in Springfield, O., bearing in mind the adage to the effect that "it's an ill wind that blows nobody good," used a recent fire which occurred at the Bijou theater, at Xenia, O., as an advertisement. The newspaper story of the fire, in which Operator John Routzahn, of the Bijou, showed fine nerve and received painful burns, was reprinted in the advertisement of the Springfield houses, with the following comment: "'Safety First' is one of the secrets of the wonderful success of the Majestic and the Princess. In order to assure you that nothing like what the above clipping tells could possibly happen at either the Majestic or the Princess, the management extends to you a cordial invitation to visit the booths of either theater. Just one visit will convince you that there is no safer operating booth in the United States. At least that is what those who have had the pleasure of seeing them have said. What will you say?"

Portsmouth, O., is by no means inclined to fall behind in the up-to-date idea of seeing itself in motion, and the management of the Lyric recently profited by the universal curiosity on this point by offering pictures showing school children in motion, as well as various recent events of local interest in the river city. "The Fatal Wedding" was another recent success at the Lyric, and the Vitagraph two-reel feature, "The Right of Way," also made a hit. Manager Mack is exerting himself to secure good features, and is succeeding admirably.

CASEY.

OHIO.

FRANK L. SMITH, known to almost every exhibitor in this section of the country and particularly well known in Cleveland, has taken charge of the General Film Company's branch in Cleveland as manager, suceeding A. W. Goff. Mr. Smith is a pioneer in motion pictures, for he started in business when films were considered a mere fad. But he felt, as did others who have since been vindicated, that motion pictures had a future far beyond the dreams of even the most hopeful. He was manager from time to time of a number of theaters in Cleveland, among them the Glenside, in Woodland avenue; the Fulton, in Lorain avenue, and the Columbia, in St. Clair avenue. He was traveling representative of the General Film Company for some time. Mr. Goff, it is understood, will remain in the moving picture business either in Chicago or in some city further west.

P. T. Kearns, head of the state building department, was in Akron last week to meet Gus Sun, of Springfield; Jules Hurtig, of New York, and W. C. Norris, of Akron, promoters of the new Hippodrome theater to be built in Akron. The three negotiated the adjustment of differences between the building department and the owners of the new building. J. B. Callahan, deputy state inspector of workshops, refused to O. K. the plans for the theater because he claimed the exits were not properly placed.

While a barn blazed next door 1,000 persons made their way without confusion from the Temple theater in East 55th street, Cleveland. When he learned of the fire, Henry Caplan, manager of the theater, appeared on the stage and asked the audience to leave quietly, but did not tell them the reason. The blaze did no damage to the theater.

Motion pictures of the business section of Dayton will be taken soon by the Industrial Educational Film Company of Los Angeles, according to a letter received by Mayor Shroyer. The company asks that it be sent suggestions on points of interest.

The Roof Garden theater, on North Prospect street, Marion, has opened under the management of J. K. Schwinger. The house was closed for some time because the building did not comply with the requirements of the building department.

Work is in progress at the Alvin theater, Mansfield, enlarging the stage and making a number of other general improvements.

The Cleveland Leader, in connection with the Pathe Daily News, is filming all Ohio events of interest and distributing to theaters in this territory.

Hundreds of Akron citizens are taking advantage of big photodrama "Creation" which is on a two-weeks run at the Grand Opera House.

The new Hippodrome theater, replacing the old one, at Gay and High streets, Columbus, will be completed by October 25, according to announcement of John W. Awain, president of the Pastime Amusement Company. The new theater, costing $15,000, will occupy the entire four floors of the building. The seating capacity will be double that of the old theater. The house will show feature films.

George H. Dieringer, engineer, Wheeling, has plans for a two-story brick, fireproof theater building for J. Trumbull to be built at Bellaire, at a cost of $25,000.

Paul Stuffer will build a one-story brick and hollow tile theater at Columbus at a cost of $10,000. Plans are being drawn by E. J. Stewart, architect.

Attorney General T. S. Hogan of Ohio, in filing his account of campaign expenses in the race for the Democratic nomination for United States Senator, made note of $10 for moving picture advertising. As yet Mr. Hogan is the only candidate who has reported the use of the movies for campaign purposes.

The Mansfield Shield entertained its carriers at the Royal theater recently and the management of the theater put on an extra program.

Two hundred children of the public recreation department were guests at the Colonial theater, Dayton, viewing pictures taken of the municipal swimming pool at Mound and Seventeenth streets.

The Screenless Photo-Litho Process Co. has been organized and is at work in the Marion building, Cleveland, printing portrait lithographs by a secret process. M. A. Walters, William Kohl and L. V. Round are interested in the concern.

RARIDAN.

KENTUCKY.

IN KENTUCKY the rural exhibitors are having a good inning just now. The country show houses have to depend largely on the summer months for business, but the city houses are finding things comparatively quiet. The weather in Louisville has been extremely hot for the past week and rather small audiences have attended the evening performances.

Fred Sheldon, manager of Warner's Louisville office, and Charles Pressy, who has been handling various park concessions for a number of years, have formed the S. & P. Film & Supply House, of Louisville, which has leased a large building on Green street, between Fourth and Fifth streets. Thirty-five hundred films are to be purchased, both old and new and of every style from comedy to feature. Besides the film department, a complete machine shop will be installed to take care of repairs on any make of machine, and all repair parts from screws to castings will be carried in stock for Simplex, Edison and Powers machines. No gas machines or repair parts will be carried. A renovating equipment will also be installed. The total investment of the new concern will amount to about $25,000. Manager Fred Sheldon of the new concern said that it was his intention to purchase two Ford machines for his traveling men to use in getting to the tank towns throughout the district which he will work. Handling this class of trade by rail means long waits for trains and long drives to the towns off the railroads. He figures that his men will be able to cover from three to five more towns a day by using the automobile.

R. S. Shrader, who was formerly manager of the Central Film Service Company's Louisville office, was in Louisville during the past week for the World's Film Corporation, of Indianapolis, of which he recently became general manager. He had a very good trip and made bookings with a number of local houses.

It is reported on good authority that the Mutual Film Company, of Indianapolis, Ind., is making preparations to open an office in Louisville, to handle its Kentucky and Tennessee bookings. A representative was in Louisville last week looking over several locations for the new exchange.

Manager A. C. Farrell, of the Central Film Service Company's Louisville office, is making preparations to move the exchange from over the Novelty theater to other quarters. Manager Levenson, of the Novelty theater and the new Novelty Film Company, has released the Central exchange from its lease on the present quarters. The fact that Mr. Levenson is to open his own film exchange on the second floor would have been a bad feature and both concerns were glad to cancel the lease. New quarters for the Central have not been decided upon so far.

Peter Knopf, of Crescent Hill, who has been promoting a new motion picture show to be erected at Frankfort and Pope streets, said that nothing definite had been settled upon so far, but that he thinks an incorporation will be effected within the next two weeks.

The Grand theater of Flemingsburg has closed its doors after having dropped about $2,000 into the discard. The Princess, owned by Edward Breeze, is the only remaining picture house in the city. It is said that the field is not large enough to support more than one house.

E. R. Sapp, representing a motion picture firm of Chicago, was recently in Denville, Ky., looking over arrangements for taking motion pictures of the principal scenes of interest in Danville and the big junction of the Queen & Crescent Railroad. The pictures will be taken for the railroad, which will show them at various points along their routes. Several colleges are located at Danville and special attention will be given to old Center College, now Central University, one of the leading colleges of the South for years.

Manager Spoehr, of the Nickelodeon theater, of Henderson, managed to find a Pathe Weekly cameraman in the neighborhood of Henderson about the time of the big cyclone, and motion pictures were made of the damages done by the big wind in Henderson. The films have been completed and will be shown at the Nickelodeon shortly.

The Crescent Amusement Company, of Nashville, Tenn., has completed and opened its new Princess theater in Bowling Green. This theater cost about $30,000 to build and has eight hundred seats on the first floor and two hundred on the second floor. Two Powers 6a machines were installed in the new building. A musical instrument known as a "photo player" was installed in the house at a cost of $8,000. Eight ceiling and eight side ventilators along with fourteen twelve-inch oscilliating fans manage to keep the house fairly cool. The operating booth is made of concrete and is equipped with automatic shutters. The curtain is 16 x 20 feet. The day before the house opened to the public one of the afternoon papers ran cuts of Tony Sudekum, president of the company; W. J. Williams, its secretary, and J. P. Masters, manager of the local house. Practically half of the front page was given over to the picture house, and the whole of page five in the Times-Journal was used, half of which was an advertisement of the theater. The house opened with "Mr. Barnes of New York," a six-reel Vitagraph production, featuring Maurice Costello.

J. L. Miller, who is conducting a traveling motion picture exhibit, recently showed for three nights at the schoolhouse grounds at Stithton. From Stithton he went to Steele's Cross Roads and from there to Cedar Creek. This is his third trip to this section of Kentucky, and he draws good crowds. At Stithton he showed in a tent which he carries with him, but quite often he shows in the stores or other buildings.

W. V. Shaw and Owen Ingels, recently opened a new motion picture show at Carlisle. Miss Agnes Wadell is acting as pianist. There are two shows every Tuesday, Thursday and Friday nights, three reels each. The shows start at 7.45 and 8.45.

P. Pie Williams, of Harrodsburg, recently opened the old Melba theater in the city, and is running licensed pictures. Four big reels are being shown for the popular price of five and ten cents. The balcony is reserved for colored people.

Bradley Brothers, who operate motion picture houses in several small towns, have secured a lease on the Crain building, at Warsaw, and will open a motion picture house shortly.

W. H. Viets, of La Center, recently purchased an old school building, which he is having moved onto a lot at Third street. He expects to remodel the interior of the old building and open a motion picture house shortly.

Hurley Brothers, who are operating a chain of motion picture houses, have sold the Savoy theater, of Princeton, to the Eldreds, owners of the building. The old operator, Gerald Letzinger, of Princeton, will remain in charge of the machines. Oliver Hurley, who was in charge of the theater, has taken up the management of the house at Carmi, Ill.

The Lyric theater, of Winchester, has been sold to Spahr Swift and Vic Bloomfield & Sons, proprietors of the Pastime and Colonial theaters. The deal was brought about, according to one of the owners, when it was found that three theaters were too many for a town of the size of Winchester. All three houses were showing high class productions and the Lyric, which was losing money, decided to sell out to its competitors. No figures were given out in the deal. The purchasers secure the elimination of the competition and the owners of the Lyric will retain their equipment. Phillips & Moss, who still have a lease on the building, have announced that it will be converted into a storeroom.

H. B. Schwab, who for a number of months has been operating a machine at the Lyric theter, of Olive Hill, has given up his position and moved to Winchester. He is succeeded by R. E. Hitchins.

G. D. CRAIN, JR.

LOUISVILLE.

THE weather in Louisville has remained cool and comfortable for the past ten days or two weeks, and the motion picture houses have done considerably better. Some of the houses are closed for repairs and others are severely handicapped by carrying on large improvements and remodeling work, but all in all the business is very satisfactory for the season of the year.

D. Leveson, manager of the Novelty theater, and the Novelty Film Company, is on a two weeks' vacation trip to Elkmont, Tenn., where he reports that he is having the time of his life. In a recent letter he said that he had been out picking blackberries which were one and a half to two inches in length.

The new serial production of the Universal program, known as "The Trey o' Hearts," starts at the Novelty theater this week. The serial story will not be run by the local newspapers, as a mix-up occurred over "Lucile Love," and the papers declared that they didn't get the proper support in advertising that they should have received. It is rather doubtful, however, whether this fact will hurt attendance to any extent.

The Central Feature Film Company has made arrangements to move its offices to 407 Walker building. The new quarters are slightly out of the beaten path of the film exchanges, but are centrally located. The room is a very large one and should prove satisfactory.

Ralph Studevyn, who for a long time has visited Louisville in the interests of the Central Feature Film Company's Indianapolis office, has resigned his position with that company to go with the Warner Feature Film Company.

Fred Sheldon, local manager of the Warner Feature Film Company, has severed his connection with the company and is now busy in getting the new S. & P. Film Supply House started. He was in Chicago during the past week and purchased a large stock of films and supplies for the new exchange.

L. J. Dittmar, manager of the Majestic Theater Company of Louisville, left this week for a month's trip to Atlantic City. While in the East he expects to visit a number of the leading playhouses in view of getting new ideas to work out locally.

Joe Herbert, formerly manager of the Warner Feature Film Company's Louisville office, has returned to Louisville and is again in charge of the office, which has been operated by Fred Sheldon for a number of months.

Judge W. Allen Kinney, manager of the Casino, Orpheum and Star theaters in Louisville, and the Princess, of Henderson, has returned from a month's vacation trip, spent at Atlantic City.

Ernest Carpenter, head operator at the Novelty theater, and partner in the firm of Carpenter & Johnston, has returned from a trip to Danville, Ky., where he took some commercial motion pictures for the Queen & Crescent Railroad.

The Clifton theater of Louisville, of which Robert Lucas, a prominent local attorney is president, is making arrangements for increasing the seating capacity of the theater to 1,000, which will give it the largest capacity of any suburban theater in the city.

S. B. Kramer, of the Indianapolis office of the Warner Feature Film Company, spent a week in Louisville recently, outlining a new campaign for the concern in Kentucky. The local office is being remodeled.

Julian Speer, of the Fort Wayne Electric Company, was in Louisville this week, calling on the motion picture men. Several of them are now using compensares, but there is considerable business yet to be obtained.

Audiences at the Majestic theater, of Louisville, were much pleased with the reviving "Garden of Roses," which was shown at the theater on Sunday evening, August 2. This was one of the early Mary Pickford pictures, in which Owen Moore played the leading part, and was made by the Biograph Company. Few of the audience had ever seen the picture and such as had seen it had forgotten it. This was a one-reel production and took very well.

The local office of the Kinemacolor Company of Kentucky, which was discontinued about ninety days ago, has been closed up and the furniture sold. The furniture, which was very massive and handsome, was sold to the S. & P. Film Supply House, and will be installed in the new exchange at 418 West Green street.

A motion picture house at Fern Grove, Ind., which is about fifteen miles up the river, and has to be reached by excursion boat, is doing a remarkably nice business this season. Sunday, August 2, the shows were free, as were also the open-air concerts, and five boats were used in conducting the large crowds to the grove, which draws well from all three of the falls cities.

J. E. King is pushing work on a new theater which he is having erected on Winchester avenue, in Ashland, Ky. The theater will be ready to open some time early in the fall. The lobby and flooring will be of white tiling, as will also the wainscoting. The house will have a seating capacity of 700 and the stage will be built large enough to accommodate legitimate shows.

IN THE NORTHWEST.

MANAGER BIERMAN of the Family theater on Third Street in Red Wing, Minn., and his son, Claude, have begun a two months' vacation while the picture house is closed for remodeling. It will be opened again about the middle of September.

James McConahey and Clyde Hicks of Spokane, Wash., were awarded a contract by the Washington Water Power Company to take a number of moving pictures of the company's properties at Spokane, Long Lake, Couer d'Aelene and Kellogg, Idaho.

M. R. Jenison has opened a moving picture show at White, S. D.

Mrs. Nathaniel Seaver Keay of Clifton Heights, Pa., first vice-president-general of the Daughters of the American Revolution was recently in Minneapolis, Minn., and declared that for the purpose of inspiring patriotism among public school children the moving picture was the only successful method of teaching American history. The present plan of teaching only from books she declared lacked color and interest.

Manager Colvin of the Grand Theater at Bismarck, N. D., has reduced his admission price to five and ten cents.

C. D. Green & Company have commenced the construction of a new theater on Main Street between Second and Third Streets in Anoka, Minn.

H. J. Henton has been granted a license by the city council of St. Paul, Minn., to operate an outdoor moving picture show at the rear of 357 West Seventh street.

The Princess theater at Pueblo, Col., advertised John Barleycorn as a picture which, "Will do you as much good as any sermon Billy Sunday delivered while in Colorado Springs."

Manager Evans of the Columbia theater at St. Helena, Ore., has absorbed the Arcade theater which has been conducted by Mr. and Mrs. J. N. Bendle for the last year. He has closed the Arcade and will make the Columbia the permanent home of moving pictures. The Bendles have gone to Ilwaco, Wash.

Dr. Harry G. Beeman, pastor of First Baptist Church in St. Paul, Minn., has come to the defense of the moving picture which was attacked a week before by Dr. Addison Moore of New York, substitute pastor at the People's Church. "It is not the mission of the church to compete with the theaters and moving picture shows' was Dr. Moore's statement. The moving pictures are not to detract from the church's message, but to add to it," retorted the Baptist minister who has projecting apparatus in his church. "There is a great field for their proper use. It is a move in the direction of meeting the needs of the present time. There was a day when the churches were shocked at the advent of the organ and when a minister was threatened to be deposed because he rode on a bicycle. The Dunkards even recently condemned the automobile as un-Christian."

The publicity department of the Pennsylvania Railroad has had a cameraman at work at Duluth, Minn., and Superior, Wis., filming the ore and grain shipping in the joint harbor.

The Vermilyea Building at Mitchell, S. D., has been leased by G. C. Wright, of Deadwood, and W. M. Firdreoff, of Mitchell, who will equip and operate a moving picture theater to be known as the Grand.

The Bijou Theater at Fargo, N. D., went back to a picture program after a rest of three weeks, when the pictures of the International Bible Students' Association were running. Manager Treat has adopted a licensed service program and will give features the fore part of each week.

L. B. Elliott, of Denver, Colo., has succeeded M. H. Todd as manager of the Lyric Theater at Cheyenne, Wyo.

The Orpheum Theater at Bismarck, N. D., has reduced its prices to five and ten cents.

Olympia, Wash., now has but three moving picture houses, E. A. Zabel, owner of the Acme Theater, absorbing the new Ray Theater. He will close the Acme and dispose of the equipment. H. T. Ray has been operating the Ray at Fifth and Washington streets since last April. The house seats 600. A picture policy will continue at the Ray with occasional performances of vaudeville.

The Commercial Club, of Sauk Center, Minn., has been contemplating assisting Manager De Beau at the formal opening of his new Caughren Theater about September 1.

Get What You Pay For

Most everyone wants value for his money, but ofttimes some shop around to get something for nothing and invariably they cast their lot with an unscrupulous dealer who quotes them better than catalogue prices, with the usual five per cent. for cash. Unknowingly to the purchaser the dealer may supplant a used machine or retain part of the equipment which should be included, or deny them good service in order to make up the deficit.

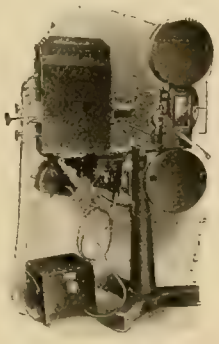
That the dealer must have a small profit in order to conduct his business legitimately, pay his debts and give the exhibitor good service, is manifest. We have nothing to gain—except knowing that the users of our machines are satisfied customers and get what they pay for.

The regular Simplex equipment consists of:

One enclosed Simplex mechanism, stereo. attachment, set of 14-in. magazines with takeup, two 10-in. steel reels, high grade motion picture lens, high grade single glass stereo. lens, lamp house, arc lamp, set of asbestos wire leads with lugs, two condensers, steel slide carrier, one 60 ampere D. P. knife switch enclosed in steel box, 45 ampere 110-volt adjustable enclosed grid rheostat, one Simplex rewinder, heavy adjustable cast iron pedestal complete, either 39 or 47½ inches high, floor to center of lens, with lag screws.

Price complete (hand drive) $300.00 list

Allowances from the list price for omissions or additional charges for variations of regular equipment, see page 27 of our new catalogue "A," copy of which may be obtained by writing us.



NOTE—If you pay list price for an outfit, less 5% for cash, and your dealer does not give you what you pay for, a favor will be conferred by writing us in detail.

MELIES.

"BURGLAR ALARM" (August 11).—Robberies in the neighborhood arouse the women to some kind of action and an automatic burglar alarm is installed in the various houses. Several nights later a burglar is captured and the treatment he receives at the hands of these women recalls to his mind the Spanish Inquisition. He is then arrested and sentenced to 60 days hard labor.

"SINEWS OF THE DEAD" (August 12).—A manufacturer has his hand injured. In order to resume his work, the doctor grafts new flesh and muscle upon it. He learns afterward that the flesh had been taken from the arm of a murderer who died on the scaffold for strangling a woman. This thought preys upon his mind and he goes insane. He spends the rest of his life in an asylum.

"A KING BY FORCE" (August 13).—Omar Fatima is forcibly made king of a Bulkin State. His wages are low and his harem is in such a state that he gives it away. Then a palace revolution occurs and after a noble fight he jumps into the sea and with his wife swims home.

"THE BILTMORE DIAMOND" (Two Parts—August 13).—A prominent woman has a very valuable diamond for which she accepts an offer from a jeweler. Two scoundrels plot to rob her of the diamond before she can part with it. They waylay her and carry her off to a house where they demand from her the diamond. With a smile she shows them the receipt for a registered package as she had deemed it safer to send it by this means. Later she takes them off their guard and escapes. An exciting antomobile chase now takes place, ending with the car in which the would-be diamond robbers are seated being hurled over the cliff to destruction.

"VOICE OF THE BELLS" (Two Parts—August 14).—Peter and Hans love Marie. Peter is favored and the date for the wedding is set. Hans is the bell-ringer for the church and angry at being rejected refuses to ring the bell at the ceremony. Years later when the daughter of Peter and Marie dies, Hans again refuses to toll the bell, but Peter makes him understand that the Voice of the Bells shall speak, and they do.

SELIG.

"THE SPECK ON THE WALL" (Two Parts—August 17).—Pauline St. John, young yet worldly, beautiful and unscrupulous, scorns the elderly husband whom she has married for his money. St. John loves his beautiful young wife passionately. He realizes her dislike for him, and his heart is torn with emotions. He is always gentle and kind and exhibits his affection in every possible way. But she accepts his caresses coldly, and only awaits his departure from the house to telephone Howland, the man in whose care she has really entrusted her heart. An appointment is made over the telephone for a meeting in the park.

John Gaunt, the great detective, is a close friend of St. John. He takes a stroll through the park and happens upon Pauline St. John, seated on a bench, awaiting the arrival of Howland. Thinking that there is something unusual in her presence there, Gaunt secretes himself, and she is not aware of his proximity. Howland arrives in his automobile and after a tender greeting they enter the car and ride away. The detective is astounded to discover that his friend's wife is intimate with another man. He is filled with rage at the treachery of the false woman. Later in the day, St. John calls upon his friend, Gaunt, and invites him to attend a house party that evening at his home. The detective is prompted to inform his friend of the falseness of his wife, but thinking that it is best to permit developments to take their course, he defers giving the information.

The detective attends the party that night, at the house of St. John. He observes a secret meeting between the faithless wife and her lover, Howland, and follows them into the shrubbery, where his curiosity is greatly excited by the production of a long, black cigar which Howland gives to Pauline with apparent concern and careful instructions as to its disposition. There is something mysterious about the cigar, and John Gaunt is determined to find out all about it. The great detective is known to both Howland and Pauline, who show apparent nervousness because of his attendance at the party. Gaunt notes this, but is careful not to let them know that he has even noticed them. The detective is perplexed. He is convinced that the long, black cigar is an important factor in some proposed venture, which Pauline and her lover have in common.

SECOND REEL.

Pauline cautiously enters the library. In the corner is a steel safe, the doors of which are standing open. Unsuspicious, St. John does not think it necessary to close the doors of the safe against the possibility of an intrusion by his own wife. Pauline opens a drawer in the safe and takes out a document —the last will and testament of St. John. The look of covetousness indicates that she is thoroughly satisfied with the contents, that he has stated plainly that he leaves to her all his goods and possessions. Howland, her accomplice, has detained St. John in conversation, while Pauline investigates the safe.

St. John is fatigued, and having courteously received the guests of himself and wife, he retires for a short rest to his comfortable lounging chair in the library. Pauline enters the library with forced gaiety and simulated affection, caresses him and apparently accidentally knocks the cigar which he is smoking from his mouth. With a gay laugh, she picks up the discarded cigar, throws it into the cuspidor and presents him with the black cigar which has been placed in her keeping by her villianous confederate. He lights it, and Pauline hurriedly escapes from the room.

John Gaunt is perplexed at the eagerness with which both Howland and Pauline seek his company immediately after Pauline leaves the library. His suspicions are aroused, and with a grim expression on his face, he starts for the library. Just then there is the sound of a shot. In the library lies the body of St. John. Overcome by the horror of it all, Pauline shrieks and bestows caresses upon the dead form, and is assisted from the room by Gaunt, who demands that the excited guests shall not leave the house until the arrival of the police. The police arrive and begin an investigation. The detective closes the library with a policeman on guard, and begins to make a hurried search. Underneath a newspaper, by the window, is a loaded revolver with one chamber empty. The detective investigates every part of the room. His eye detects a peculiar appearance on the wall. It is a tiny speck. With his glass, he investigates it more closely. With the evidence secured from the speck, on the wall, he makes rapid deductions.

In the presence of the guests whom St. John requested should be assembled, he dramatically recites the fact that the death of St. John had not been caused by a bullet from the revolver, but by a cigar loaded with some fatal explosive. "Pauline St. John and her lover, Howland, are his murderers," he says. The guilty pair endeavor to escape. They are quickly restrained and handcuffs are slipped upon the wrists of Howland. John Gaunt has captured the assassins of his friend.

LUBIN.

"THE DREAMER" (Two Parts—August 19).—A Dreamer stood attempting to place God's handiwork upon the canvas. Hearing a shrill cry he turns to witness a young girl falling from the rocks. He gives succor and a friendship was born that later became love. The Dreamer's brother, coming home upon a vacation, enters the peaceful Eden and like the snake of old—crushes happiness into a distorted thing. The brother, in his ego, takes unto himself the Dreamer's sweetheart, and weds her. A child is born. The father of the boys is stricken and thinking he is about to die gives the elder brother and his wife all his money, and the elder brother, despising the Dreamer, throws him out upon the world. Five years later we find the Dreamer working in a pottery, creating from the clay; the elder brother living on the riotous road of the newly rich, choosing companions whose words and deeds have sped many to perdition. The Dreamer's brother becoming hysterical with his environments, places his own father in an asylum, that he may have free hands, without restraint. Then he leaves his wife, formerly the Dreamer's sweetheart. The Dreamer, learning of this through a staunch servant, and at the instigation of the physician attending the wife who has become ill unto death, searches for the brother, and finds him in the midst of a gay throng. Tearing him from their midst by physical might, he takes him to his home and his wife, and then wanders beside the brook, where in the early days of a pure affection he and his sweetheart were wont to linger over a stick planted by her hands. The Dreamer removes the vines that have grown around the stick, and holding it in his hands, breaks it apart to let it float down the stream of destiny, as he offers up a prayer.

"HIS BROTHER'S BLOOD" (Two Parts—August 20).—Dr. Kenneth Meyers and his brother Gerald, an artist, are both fond of Ethel Wilson, who really favors Gerald more than she does the physician, and later accepts him as her suitor. Kenneth resolves to devote his life to science and buries himself in his laboratory, where he is specializing in blood tests. Gerald's studio companion, Tyson Brooks, is an erratic fellow, and when Gerald tries to correct his inexperience, Brooks resents it and ends his life after a struggle with his companion, which is seen by a maid, who accuses Gerald of murder. Fearing that he will be incriminated by circumstantial evidence, Gerald flees to New York, and that night the lodging house where he stops is destroyed by fire. Still eager to escape arrest, Gerald continues his flight, taking passage on a sailing vessel for San Francisco, where he arrives three months later. Kenneth receives news that Gerald was killed in the lodging house fire, and believing her fiance dead, Ethel and Kenneth renew their friendship and become engaged to wed. Upon his arrival in Frisco, Gerald scans the newspaper files to see what disposition was made of the investigation of Brooks' death, and finds first the notice of his brother's engagement to wed Ethel and then later that Brooks was found to have committed suicide. He then decides to return home and test Ethel and see if she really loves his brother. He arrives home on the eve of his brother's wedding and when he witnesses an ardent love scene between Ethel and Kenneth the sight is too much for him and he collapses from exhaustion. Hurried to the hospital with typhoid fever, Kenneth is called upon to examine the blood of the patient, who is supposedly a tramp. Something in the shape and appearance of the blood crystals tells him they have a familiar appearance and upon closer investigation he recognizes them as exactly similar to his own. Anxious to see this extraordinary man he is led to the ward and sees the brother he mourned as dead and then feeling that he has no right to wed his brother's sweetheart, he struggles with his conscience, sends for Ethel and releases her from her promise. Kenneth battles gravely for his brother's life, saves it and reunites his brother and his fiancee, happy at the thought that after all his brother's blood has taught him a new scientific fact, that heredity can be traced through the blood, and that with this achievement he is recognized as a new medical authority.

"THE LOVE OF ORO SAN" (August 21).—The U. S. S. South Dakota anchors at Kobe, Japan. Lieut. Roy Leeds, one of the young officers, goes ashore in the ship's launch to stroll through the little city. In a handsome house in Kobe, surounded by a beautiful walled garden, lives Hioto, a Japanese dignitary, and his daughter, Oro San, happy, care-free and full of life. She longs to see something of the outside world, and in a mischievous moment slips out into the street. Leeds, passing at that moment, stops and watches the little maid. The sleeve of her kimona catches in the gate. Leeds laughingly releases her and they part, both registering interest in the meeting. Capt. Iwata, after years of service in the Japanese army, returns to Kobe. He is an old friend of Hioto's and goes to the house, sees and admires Oro San. He asks Hioto for Oro San's hand in marriage. Hioto assents, takes Iwata to Oro San, and commands her to marry the Japanese officer. Oro San rebels, declaring that she does not love him. Hioto imperiously tells the girl that she must obey. Oro San decides to run away. She goes to the landing on the shore, hides aboard the ship's launch and is carried out to the cruiser. She slips on board and causes surprise among the seamen. Leeds, wondering what the trouble is, appears and is surprised to see the little Japanese lady. Oro San tells Leeds her story and that she wishes to run away. Leeds tells Oro San that she must return to her home before her absence is discovered. The girl objects to going back, but Leeds picks her up in his arms, carries her aboard the ship's launch and takes her back to the garden. During a week that passes, Leeds sees Oro San frequently. Then Hioto leaves on a journey. Leeds meets Oro San in the garden, tells her that he loves her and asks her to marry him. Iwata attempts to seize Oro San, saying that she is to be his bride. Noting Oro San's aversion to Iwata, Roy promptly puts the Japanese officer out of the garden. Returning to Oro San, Leeds finds the girl debating between her love for Leeds and the danger of running counter to Japanese custom. She tells Leeds to return the next day and she will give him her answer. Leeds enters the garden the next day, closely followed by Iwata and two cut-throats. Iwata and his two men conceal themselves in some shrubery, with drawn weapons. Oro San, from the house, sees Leeds waiting for her in the garden. On her way to meet Leeds, she runs across Iwata and his drawn revolver. Then she sees the two other Japs in ambush. Iwata tells her that he is going to kill her American lover. The girl pleads in vain with him. Finally she sees Leeds coming down the walk into the ambush. Then she offers to do anything to save Leeds, even to marrying Iwata. The latter tells her that if she would save the American, she must tell him that she does not love him. Oro San meets Leeds on the walk, faces him with forced girl jerks away and commands him to go. away. Leeds, astounded, refuses to believe her at first. He attempts to take her hands. The girl jerks away and commands him to go. Dazed, Leeds finally leaves while Oro San looks after him with hopeless love and resignation in her face. That night, the cruiser leaves the harbor. Oro San, from the window of her home, watches with despair the passing out of her love.

MAKING AUNTIE WELCOME (August 22).—Jack and Grace get word that Auntie is coming to make them a long visit. Jack decides that the best way to get rid of her is to play crazy. He practices on his wife with such excellent acting that the maid decides that he is trying to kill her and with the grocery boy run for the police. Then the Aunt comes and Jack chases her so far up the street he thinks she will never some back. Meantime Mrs. Smith, down the block, thinks her baby is sick and comes for Grace for advice. Grace goes with her to see the child and when the police arrest Jack it is decided that he has killed his wife and hidden the body. They find the Aunt waiting on the steps of the police station for a policemen to come along, and when they tell her about the murder she takes it out on the helpless Jack until Grace gets back from the neighbor's and comes to his rescue. It was a great little scheme, but it worked so well that Jack begs the policemen to kick him and feels better when they do.

SOMETIMES IT WORKS (August 22).—Sam Sprague loves Maude Malcolm, but the course of true love does not run smooth, for Maude has quite a bit of temper. She and Sam have one of their usual scraps and Iza Ingham suggests to him that he get Maude jealous by making love to her. It works perfectly and it is all Maude can do to keep her brother from trying to thrash Sam, though her brother Tom is only a midget. Then Maude's brother Bill comes from the West. Sam has forgotten all about Bill and when over the phone Maude tells him her brother is coming to thrash him, Sam figures that he can blow Tom out of the window with a hard cough. It is a most dismal, disillusionment when Bill enters, and to make matters worse, Sam sprinkles Bill with the contents of a siphon, thinking it is Tom. After a while Bill brings out Sam's remains and ask Maude if she wants them. Maude turns on Bill and tries to beat him up, but abandons the job and turns her attention to poor Sam. Iza appears on the scene and it looks like a brand new war, but it turns out well, for there are explanations developing the fact that Bill is engaged to Iza. The two couples bill and coo and Tom, out in the cold, decides that he is in the way.

"BACK TO THE FARM" (August 18).—Tom and Bob write Auntie that they want to make her a visit in town. Auntie writes them to come ahead, though she does not expect to be at home. She tells them to come up two flights and look under the door mat for the key. The boys are a bit stupid and come up only one flight to find the key of Mr. and Mrs. Cassett, who use the same hiding place for their key. There is a dinner on the table and the boys bless auntie's thoughtfulness and eat it up, then go to bed. Tom kicks Bob out of bed and Bob is too sleepy to climb back again, so he rolls under the bed and goes to sleep again. Mr. Cassett arrives and is surprised to find a man in his bed. He draws his revolver and chases Tom out of the house. The noise wakens Bob, who crawls into bed to be found by Mrs. Cassett. She takes a gun from the bureau drawer and shoots Bob up. Both husband and wife are arrested for assault with intention to kill. The boys make their escape and try to enter the house quietly by the window, but once more they have to dodge bullets and are placed under arrest. This time Auntie arrives and explains. But the boys decide that the farm is less trying on their nerves.

"PRIVATE DENNIS HOGAN" (August 17).—Dennis Hogan, a rollicking, devil-may-care Irishman, who is an expert telegrapher, has been in the United States ten years. In a large city, broke and unable to get a job, he joins the army. He is sent to Fort Miles, Montana, for duty. Thomas, the Post Telegrapher's term of service expires and Dennis is promoted to that position. Shortly afterwards the Sioux Indians go on the warpath. Dennis handles a telegram to Colonel Foster ordering out his regiment to suppress the Indian uprising, and begs to be allowed to go with his troop. After securing a substitute, he is allowed to go. The regiment is surrounded by a horde of Indians at Red Bud Crossing; the expected reinforcements do not arrive and the situation becomes desperate. Colonel Foster is about to send a volunteer on a dangerous ride to Fort Stanton for help when Dennis steps forward and says he will get through the enemy to the telegraph line, cut in on the wire and call Fort Stanton, thus facilitating matters. The Colonel consents to let him try it, and after a running fight, he reaches a telegraph line. Dennis sees an Indian following him, fires the last shot in his gun and the redskin falls. Dennis then cuts in and delivers his message. As he finishes, the Indian, who has only been badly wounded, crawls up behind the soldier and kills him, falling dead over his body. Colonel Clarke of Fort Stanton arrives with reinforcements in the nick of time to rescue Colonel Foster's command. Standing beside the body of Private Dennis, his comrades are reminded of that little verse, "Now match him if you can, this Reg'lar Army man, the marchin', flyin', offtimes dyin', Reg'lar Army Man."

"AN INNOCENT DELILAH" (Two Parts—August 18).—Peter Waring, a young rancher, represents his district in a court fight against a power corporation, which has diverted the water from the irrigation ditches. White, his lawyer, is secretly bought over by the corporation and traitorously confiscates the records showing the ranchers are entitled to the water rights. Waring meets Lilah, beautiful daughter of Richard Dunham, President of the Power Corporation, falls in love with her, and she with him. Just before the day of the trial, he accidentally discovers the missing papers in White's office. White misinforms Waring as to the date of trial, and Dunham induces his daughter to innocently give Waring a party in his honor on that day. He leaves the precious records with Lilah for a few moments and her father gains possession of them. Jim Lincoln, White's junior partner and Waring's friend, warns the latter that the trial is scheduled for that very day, and springing on a horse, Waring rides like mad to reach the courtroom. There he finds the papers have been stolen and accuses White of treachery. He is ordered to leave the courtroom. Returning to Lilah's home, he accuses the girl of acting the part of a Modern Delilah. She denies it, but refuses to incriminate her father. Waring denounces her and goes back to the ranch thoroughly discouraged. That night Lilah recovers the papers and next day she and Lincoln secure an order for a new trial. Lilah hears that the ranchers, believing Waring has turned traitor, are planning to mob him, rides with all speed to save him. She arrives in time to convince the men that her father alone is to blame, and save Waring from being roughly handled. The ranchers apologize and withdraw, while Waring drops to his knees beside the girl, overwhelmed by his gratitude and love.

"TAKEN BY STORM" (August 19).—An impetuous sturdy mountain lad, Jim Raynor finds Cummings, a drummer, making love to Betty, his sweetheart. He rushes up to them, knocks Cummings down, and drives him from the place. He then forcibly carries her off to the Justice of the Peace, where she absolutely refuses to go through the ceremony. He accordingly takes her to his home, where he compels her to sit on the porch for an hour in silence. Her mind proves changeable, and she passively allows him to take her back to the Justice's house, where the two are married. On the threshold of their new home, they have a quarrel, she cries and Jim, on seeing her tears, feels he has been cruel to her, and swears never to see her again until she comes to him of her accord. Some time later, Cummings, by means of a decoy letter, gets Betty to go driving with him and leaves a note for Jim, indicating they have eloped. Betty soon discovers the deception and begs to be taken home, but Cummings laughs at her. She struggles with him and he ties her hands behind her. He stops at a roadside Inn and Betty, taking the reins in her teeth, manages to escape. Jim, who has been searching in vain for the couple, returns heart-broken to his deserted home, just as the half-fainting girl arrives. He carries her into the house, where she kneels behind his chair and tells him she needs his guidance and protection. Jim in his happiness clasps her tightly in his arms.

"THE WOES OF A WAITRESS" (August 20).—Blonde, and with a fetching manner, Maime Murray is waitress at a small restaurant. Bob Stevens, a plumber, is her "steady." Maime makes the acquaintance of Max Fletcher, a flashily-dressed confidence man, who discovers that Maime has a little hoard of money saved up. He declares he is a real estate agent, and suggests she invest in some lots he claims to own. Maime is flustered by his attention and dazzled at the prospects of making a fortune. She gives Bob a cold "turn-down" and accepts an invitation to go to supper with Max. Bob learns that Maime is going with Max to look over some real estate and spend the day at Coney Island afterwards. Bob meets a detective, who has Max under observation, and the two shadow Maime and Max. He shows her some vacant lots, purported to be his, but she refuses to pay over the money, as she has a notion that a business deal cannot be put through on Sunday. She and Max then go to dinner, still watched by Bob and the detective. Here the confidence man pretends his pockets have been picked, and apologetically borrows Maime's purse. He starts an argument over the dinner bill, and starts for the manager's office, but instead, skips out a side door with Maime's hard-earned savings. He is seen by the detective, who arrests him. Maime becomes worried and suspicious at Max's long absence, when Bob appears and saves her from further trouble by paying the dinner bill. Benson then arrives, bringing Max in handcuffs. The purse is restored to Maime, and she, humbly grateful, tells Bob she has learned a lesson. He readily forgives her, and the two walk off arm-in-arm.

"THE HONEYMOONERS" (August 21).—No sooner have Jimmy and Mary, a newly married couple, entered their new home when Jimmie receives a note from his wealthy uncle, announcing his intention of paying his nephew and heir a visit that evening. The letter also reminds Jimmie he must keep away from marital entanglements for the present if he wishes to remain in his uncle's will, as uncle has already picked out his future bride. Mary, on learning of the contents of the note, goes off into hysterics, and while Jimmy is frantically trying to soothe her, the bell rings. It is uncle! Both are galvanized into action, and after hastily arranging matters, the young man admits his uncle. Jimmie acts extremely nervous and several times the pair are nearly caught unawares, but when the attractive "maid" smiles at uncle, he forgets all else and starts a flirtation with her. Uncle then sends Jimmie out on various errands, and then secures a huge bouquet, which he presents to Mary, saying, "For you, dearie!" She is pleased until he tries to put an arm around her waist, then she changes instantly into a veritable little fury, gives him a tongue lashing and winds up by smashing the bouquet over his head. She then goes off into hysterics again, just as Jimmie returns from his last errand. Uncle is in a fearful rage. Suddenly he discovers various pieces of women's apparel and demands an explanation. Jimmie is speechless, but Mary springs up, marches up to uncle, pointing to her wedding ring. Uncle bursts out again, but Mary talks soothingly and leads him to a settee, where she and Jimmie wait on him hand and foot. Mary lights a cigar for him and uncle finally capitulates.

"LILY OF THE VALLEY" (Two Parts—August 22).—On the death of old Kemble, his daughter, Lily, is left in the came of his cronie, Maynard, with three thousand dollars for her upbringing. Lily is sent to Spring Valley, to live with Prudence and Samantha, boyhood friends of Maynard. Hugh Graham, a young lawyer friend of Maynard's, finding business very poor, takes a class in the Spring Valley district school for the summer. Lily, now sixteen, is sent to school and falls in love with Hugh. He confiscates a note written by her to another pupil, which reads, "Isn't Hughie the sweetest thing! I just love him." Lily is very angry, and refuses to say good-bye to Hugh when he leaves the school, while he dreams of nothing but the fascinating little school girl. Two years later, Hugh, who is now prosperous, is told by Maynard that he has spent all of Lily's money. Not knowing Maynard has already written to Samantha, telling her all about it, Hugh sacrifices everything he has of value to restore the money to Lily, and then finds his old friend, Maynard, dead in his chair. Hugh visits Spring Valley to straighten matters out with the two old ladies, and tries to impress upon them that Lily's money is intact. They only smile, and appreciate his well-meant sacrifice, show him Maynard's confession. He then asks for Lily, who has been listening outside, but she bashfully runs away to the old schoolhouse. Hugh follows her, takes her unresistingly in his arms, and Uncle Si joyfully spreads the news that Hugh and Lily are engaged to be married.

"A TALE OF OLD TUCSON" (August 11).—When Red Alvarez wrote to Old Man Wakeman, and told him that he would seize his house and property, unless the money owed him was promptly paid, Wakeman decided that his only course was to sell some mining property he owned to settle Alvarez's debt. So he rode into town and made all the arrangements with his lawyer. Returning with a bag of gold dust, he fainted just as he reached the spot where Ned Shannon and Pedro, a Mexican boy, were camping. Reviving for a moment, Wakeman begged Ned to take the gold dust to his daughter. Then he died.

Ned started for Wakeman's ranch with the gold dust, but on the way he stopped at a saloon to get a drink. Some men were gambling inside, and Ned, after a moment's hesitation, joined them. There is no use in attempting to excuse Ned's conduct. He borrowed some of Wakeman's gold dust to win back the money he had lost, and when that went too, plunged more and more heavily. As a consequence, when he allowed Pedro to lead him home that night, there was nothing in the bag Wakeman had given him, except a picture of Concha, the old man's daughter.

After her father went to town, Concha had been having a good deal of trouble with Red Alvarez, who persisted in forcing his unwelcome attentions upon her. At last, worried at her father's absence, she decided to go in town and find him. When she arrived in town she stopped at the big gambling hall. Her father was not there, but the sight of the roulette wheel gave Concha an idea. If she could only win a thousand dollars before six o'clock, she would be able to lift the threatening shadow of Red Alvarez forever. So she started to play.

Ned Shannon came in at that moment and recognized Concha from her picture. A moment's inspection of the play convinced him that the wheel was crooked. So he took charge of affairs and, at the point of his revolver forced the croupier to play fair. Red Alvarez, actual owner of the wheel, attempted to shoot Shannon from the balcony, but was tackled by the boy, Pedro. Wild with rage, Alvarez flung the boy to the curbstone below, and fell dead with Shannon's bullet in his heart. Pedro was not killed, and after everything had been explained, Concha and Ned took him home together.

"THE ADVENTURE OF THE PICKPOCKET" (Eighth of the Octavius Amateur Detective Series—August 15).—When Octavius read in the morning paper that there had been many complaints about pickpockets at Coney Island, he decided to investigate conditions, and to see if his massive intellect could not suggest a remedy. So he disguised himself as a farmer, and went down to Coney Island.

At the time that Octavius arrived, The Flim Flam Motion Picture Company was engaged in taking a few scenes for its masterly production of "No Mother to Chide Her." Octavius did not see the camera—all he saw was the motherless and unchidden heroine in the act of stealing a lady's pocketbook. He promptly gave chase—to the very considerable detriment of the Film Flam Company's scene. The alarmed leading lady, thinking Octavius mad, made every effort to escape from him, but in vain. Octavius soon overhauled her, and ordered her to follow him to the police station. Octavius was himself arrested at the command of the indignant director. Owing to the fact that he was a young man of independent means, Octavius managed to fix things with the diretcor, but not until he had spent a rather unpleasant ten minutes.

Somewhat discouraged as a result of his initial attempt, Octavius decided to have some lunch. His sympathies were aroused by a lady, of what seemed to him a peculiarly innocent appearance, and with his usual chivalry he warned her of the dangers of the place, and begged her to accept his protection.

While they were at lunch, two detectives, to whom Octavius had disclosed his business at Coney Island, approached and congratulated him on his capture of the lady of innocent appearance, who, it seems, was none other than Chicago Nell.

Octavius was not over-slow in taking full credit for his achievement, and managed to suppress any slight surprise he may have felt, when he discovered at the station house that Chicago Nell had made the best of their short acquaintance by relieving him of his watch and money.

"BY THE AID OF A FILM" (Tenth of The Man Who Disappeared Series—August 18).—John Perriton gave up his place in society and disappeared for the sake of Mary Wales. Her brother, Nelson, had been surprised by the butler in an attempt to steal Mary's jewels. In the fight which ensued, Nelson killed the butler. Perriton happened to enter at this moment, and with the chivalrous motive of saving the name of the girl he loved from disgrace, assumed the responsibility for Nelson's deed, and fled.

After a series of thrilling adventures, Perriton was at last arrested as a result of the malevolence of Nelson Wales, the man he saved. Mary, now firmly convinced of her lover's innocence, and her brother's guilt, added her brains to Perriton's in the attempt to find some way of proving his innocence. The attempt seemed hopeless. Nelson was the only witness. Perriton had just as strong a motive for stealing the jewels, and Perriton was the one who had fled from justice.

Perriton decided to steal a page from "Hamlet" and see if the play might not be the thing to catch the guilty conscience of Nelson Wales. Under his direction, Mary hired a motion picture company and took it to the Wales' estate. Here she caused three of the actors to make up exactly like the principals of the tragedy, and had the entire scene acted in accordance with Perriton's directions.

When the film was completed, Nelson was put in a darkened room, and the picture was flashed on the screen before him. The exact reproduction of his crime was too much for his weakened nerves. Mad with fear, he attacked the phantom figures with a chair, and was promptly arrested by the concealed police. He made a full confession of his crime, and died of heart failure.

John Perriton's vagabond life was finally at an end. He was enabled to take again the position he had forfeited. Three months after Nelson's death he married Mary.

"THE OLD FIRE HORSE" (August 19).—When Old Jim was sold to the City Fire Department there was a wailing and gnashing of teeth in Engine House No. 69. For Jim was the best fire horse in the business. In every department of his profession he was so nearly perfect that few could discern any trifling flaws.

Morgan, the farmer who bought Jim, found him an exceedingly useful addition. The only trouble was that they could not ring any bells about the farm. Whenever they did, Jim would dash out of his stall and stand waiting to have his harness put on.

Joe Berry, one of Morgan's farm hands, was in love with Betty Morgan. Betty liked him but she felt that she was better than he was. When Nick Sharp appeared from the city and started to shower her with attentions, she dropped Joe. Nick was different than awkward country bumkins like Joe.

All Nick was after was the legacy Betty had lately received from a distant relative. Betty, a mere child in Sharp's experienced hands, consented to run away with him when Joe and the Morgans had gone into town. Hitching Old Jim up to a rig, they started out. Suddenly, Old Jim heard a fire bell ringing. He pricked up his ears, and turning around started for the sound. Sharp tugged at the reins in vain. Jim knew his duty, and did not intend to be dissuaded from its performance. So he kept on at full speed until he brought Sharp and Betty to the fire.

In the crowd in front of the blazing building were Joe and Betty's father and mother. Moreover, there was a constable. While her parents were pouring their reproaches into Betty's ears, the constable arrested Sharp. He was wanted for several other little escapades of a similar character to this attempt. Betty decided that she had made a pretty big mistake, and told Joe her decision. Then they all drove back to the farm together.

"THE GILDED KIDD" (Special—Two Parts—August 21).—The Gilded Kidd was a great favorite with newspaper reporters in need of a story. Born with a gold spoon in his mouth, the proud possessor of an over-indulgent father, the young man was continually getting into scrapes of all sorts—for which father promptly paid the bills. Thanks to the newspaper notoriety he had received, the Gilded Kidd's face was well known about town. Wherever he appeared, merchants, headwaiters, and barkeepers raised their hands aloft and gave thanks to Allah.

But though father's millions effectually guarded most of the ways of life for him, there was one in which he was not so lucky—love. He was madly infatuated with Elsie Lucas, but Elsie looked askance at him. She did not intend to marry a man who was nothing but a public joke. So she smiled on Tom Graham, and the Gilded Kidd squirmed in helpless rage.

One day Kidd got into an argument with Graham over the relative rights of the poor and the rich. Graham claimed that it was an impossibility for the Kidd to get arrested, and the Kidd instantly bet him that he could land inside of a jail in three days. The loser of the wager was to absent himself from the fair Elsie for the space of three months.

The next morning the Kidd started out to get himself arrested. It was not as easy as it seemed. When he openly stole fruit from a fruit-stand, the vender merely smiled happily, and prepared a bill for his father. When he broke the windows in a house, the indignant owner was quickly placated by the policeman she sent for. When he went to sleep on a park bench another policeman put a sunshade over him lest the glare hurt his eyes. Even his threats to commit suicide were treated lightly by the indulgent police, and when he claimed that he had murdered a man, they refused to arrest him because he couldn't produce the body.

At last, in desperation, he succeeded in bribing a warden to allow him to take a prisoner's place. When he was at last happily in the cell, Elsie, with a committee from a woman's club, visited the jail and saw him. On the register the man whose place the Kidd had taken was inscribed as "Bill Nabb—Breach of Promise under an assumed name." Elsie looked at it and fled in horrified wrath. But the worst was yet to come. For when the Kidd was thinking of leaving, the warden handed him a note he had just received. The note read as follows:

Mr. Jailer—You can tell the young man if hes wateing for me hell haveter wate a long wile becuz I aint never coming back. Bill Nabb.

"IN LIEU OF DAMAGES" (August 22).—When Sadie married Pete Brown instead of Lyss Baily, Lyss was very angry. If he had not loved Sadie as much as he did, Lyss might have killed Pete, for might ruled despite the law in the little mountain community of Jackson's Hollow, and when passions ran high, there was frequently bloodshed.

A year or two after their marriage Pete Brown was killed in an accident at the saw mill in which he worked. The company's paymaster called on Sadie, and, owing to his plausible arguments, she agreed to adjust her claim of damages for the sum of seventy-five dollars. After Sadie had paid for her husband's funeral there was not very much left. In a few months she was reduced to poverty.

When Lyss heard of Sadie's situation his heart bled for her. Calling on her, he promised to raise the money she needed so badly. Situated as he was, there seemed only one thing for him to do. So he took his rifle and went down to the main road to wait for some wealthy passer-by.

The first man to appear was the doctor. With Lyss' rifle pointed at his heart there was nothing for him to do but give up the saddle bags he carried. Lyss took them and hurried back to Sadie.

When he reached home, Lyss discovered, to his horror, that his mother was dying, and that the doctor had been coming to see her. When, through the window, he heard the doctor telephoning for more of the medicine which he had in his saddle bags, there was nothing for Lyss to do but rush in with the stolen bags and confess his crime.

Meanwhile the paymaster, who loved Sadie and hated Lyss, had prepared a cowardly plot against his rival. Rushing in, he accused Lyss of holding him up and robbing him of the company's money.

But while Lyss stood in silent horror, and the good doctor, who had forgiven him for his attempt against his own property, drew away from the boy, Sadie entered and cleared matters up. She had seen the paymaster hide the money for the sake of implicating Lyss. When Sadie had finished telling the paymaster exactly what she would do if he didn't give Lyss a good job, everything ended happily.

"SWEEDIE AND THE DOUBLE EXPOSURE" (August 17).—The boy has a camera and snaps Sweedie, the cook, while sitting on the bench in the back yard. Later he takes a picture of his father while sitting on the same bench. He forgets to turn the film in his camera, so gets a double exposure, giving the effect of Sweedie sitting on his father's lap. The young rascal shows the picture to his mother. She proceeds to upbraid her hubby, who is unable to explain himself. He does not recollect sitting on Sweedie's lap. After causing a fight between his parents, the kid shows the freak picture to the ice man and milkman, who are fighting for the hand of Sweedie. They both start in search of their supposed rival, and naturally wipe the floor with him when he comes in.

"THE BLACK SIGNAL" (August 18).—John Farell, governor of the state, has refused to pardon a young man condemned to hang for murder. Years before Farell had married, and shortly after, gone West prospecting for gold He had heard of his wife's supposed death, but never returned home. An hour before the execution, the mother comes to Farell and pleads for her son's life. The governor discovers that she is his wife. As he picks up the 'phone to call the prison, the black signal flutters from the prison flagpole, telling the story—he has hanged his own son. Sick with remorse, he takes his wife tenderly in his arms, and they decide to start life anew.

"THE MANDOLIN PLAYERS AND THE WILLING PERFORMERS" (August 19).—Fred and Eustice, two specimens of Veal, have been beating it up to see Myrtle for eight years. They always bring their mandolins and play sweet ditties. Fred's cousin from St. Paul comes to pay him a visit. He is fresher than Green Paint, and breezes along with Fred to see Myrtle. Fred warns him not to pull any of his regular stuff, or he'll get in bad. Right away Gus said, "Me for her," but Fred only replied, Nothing doing; She's particular." However, in eight minutes Gus was reading her palm, and came closer to holding her hand than either of them had in eight years. The two boobs amused them on their mandolins. In three weeks Gus and Myrtle were married. The music was furnished by Home Talent. MORAL: To get a fair trial of Speed, use a Pace-maker.

"SLIPPERY SLIM AND THE CLAIM AGENT" (August 20).—Slim hears of Silas Sloe collecting $50,000 from the railroad. Slim has an idea. He rigs up a dummy and places it in front of a train. He then makes believe that it was he who was injured, and brings suit against the railroad. A claim agent offers to settle the affair for $5.00, but Slim refuses. During his absence Mustang Pete, who has called on Sophie, poses as Slim when another claim agent appears. Pete releases the railroad of all responsibility for $9.00. When Slim returns, Sophie tells him what has happened, and they proceed to handle poor Pete most roughly.

"BRANCHO BILLY'S WILD RIDE" (August 22).—Broncho Billy, an outlaw, is captured but eludes his captors, and while making his getaway, runs upon the county judge's daughter, who is helplessly trying to stop her runaway horse. He makes a thrilling rescue while going at top speed on horseback, but is captured by the posse and taken back to town. When the young lady recovers consciousness she asks for her recuer. When told who saved her, she rushes to town, and after explaining to her father that Broncho Billy saved her life, the outlaw is released.

"THE MASKED WRESTLER" (Two Parts—August 21).—Margery Winters sees a wrestling bout in which the "Masked Wrestler" is the victor. She is wild with enthusiasm and longs to meet the wonderful athlete, whose face she has never seen. She goes to Louis, a suitor, thinking that possibly he can arrange an introduction for her. He suggests that she invite the "Masked Wrestler" to her reception the following week. She does so and the wrestler appears, but does not remove his mask. M. Lefevre, a scheming suitor for the hand of Margery, sees that she is more than interested in this mysterious stranger, and offers him an insult which results in a duel. The "Masked Wrestler" is the winner, but Lefevre swears revenge. Shortly afterward the mysterious athlete is to wrestle for the championship of France. Lefevre offers his opponent money to unmask his rival before the crowd. The "Masked Wrestler" hears of this and it makes him all the more determined to win. He administers a stinging defeat to the champion and while Margery is still wild with excitement, takes off his mask. Her heart all but stops beating, she is so overjoyed at seeing that Louis and the "Masked Wrestler" are the same person. That evening Louis realizes that winning the championship is a great honor, but winning the girl he loves is by far a greater joy.

"THE OLD ARMY COAT" (Special—Two Parts—August 17).—Discovering his nephew, Leroy, to be a rake and a thief, old Major Robertson decides to leave his entire fortune to his ward, Alice. The girl is the daughter of the Major's old sweetheart. Leroy is filled with anger at the turn of events. Fearing lest he find and destroy the will, Alice hides the document in the secret pocket of her guardian's old army coat. Later, Leroy is the cause of a heart stroke which kills Major Robertson. The nephew institutes a search for the will. Coming across the army coat, he throws it out of the window, never suspecting it contains the precious document. A tramp finds the garment and appropriates it.

The fact that Alice is unable to produce the will causes the estate to go to Leroy. The girl thereupon leaves the house to become a schoolmistress in the next county. Meanwhile, a farmer discovers the tramp sleeping in his barn. He drives the hobo out. In his haste to leave, the man neglects to pick up the coat which he had used as a pillow. The farmer later uses the garment on a scarecrow.

Several months pass. While out autoing with a crowd of boon companions, Leroy sees Alice walking along the country road. Ignorant of her identity, the scoundrel resolves upon a flirtation. In her effort to escape from the man, Alice hides behind the scarecrow. Despite its battered condition, the girl recognizes the old coat. She searches through the secret pocket and finds the will. Accompanied by her attorney, Alice appears before Leroy, the following day. The news comes like a thunderbolt to the man. Filled with helpless rage, he slinks from the house.

"THE STORM AT SEA" (August 18).—Jane and Florence, sisters, live in a fishing village. Jane, the elder of the two, discovers that a friendship has sprung up between Florence and Jim Hire, a young fisherman. Fearing the man's intentions, Jane warns her sister. To further his ends, Jim proposes to Jane, telling the girl that his purpose in calling at the cottage is to be near her instead of Florence. His plan succeeds. This is Jane's first love affair and she loves Jim with her whole, strong nature. A subtle shyness prevents her from imparting the news to Florence. Jim, in the meantime, really in love with Florence, asks her to marry him.

About to depart on a fishing trip, Jim bids goodbye to Jane and then secretly marries Florence. Wishing to keep the marriage a secret until Jim's return, the girl conceals the wedding ring by suspending it from her neck on a string. A terrific storm arises on the night before Jim's return. The sisters are awakened by the din and cling to each other in fright. Jane discovers the wedding ring dangling from her sister's neck and learns of Florence's marriage.

Although her dream of happiness is shattered, Jane determines to say nothing which might lead Florence to suspect the truth. A falling spar injures Jim seriously. His battered craft reaches port the next morning and the fisherman is brought to the home of the sisters. Jim realizes how contemptible his conduct has been when Jane presently enters the room. After a moment's silence, the elder sister warns him that his life depends upon Florence's happiness. Florence enters the room and throws her arms about her husband's neck in a paroxysm of happiness. Meanwhile, Jane, her heart broken, gazes toward the sea, praying for strength to withstand the loneliness of the coming years.

"THE BOND ETERNAL" (Special—Two Parts—August 19).—Just before the birth of her son, Nora is deserted by her worthless husband, Dan. Vane, the old doctor who attends Nora, also has for his patient Mrs. King, wife of a banker. Mrs. King's baby is born dead. Fearing lest Mrs. King's mind be affected by the news, Vane induces Nora to surrender her child and places it by the wealthy woman's side. King and Vane agree to keep the knowledge that the boy is not her own, from Mrs. King.

Five years later finds Nora employed as a model. Standish, an artist, begs her to marry him. The woman refuses, telling him her story. They strive to locate Dan, but are finally led to believe him dead. In a distant city, Dan is released from prison. He learns of Nora's approaching marriage. The drunkard appears upon the scene in time to prevent the ceremony. Although heart-broken, Nora turns a deaf ear to Standish's pleas and resumes her life as Dan's wife.

Fifteen years later, Nora, withered and aged by suffering, is dying of tuberculosis. Dan comes upon a letter written by Standish years before, stating that he has placed a large sum at Nora's disposal with his bankers. The drunkard hastens to the bank, where he hands the old letter to King. Raymond, the banker's son, is interested by the story. After 'phoning Dr. Vane, the boy induces his father to accompany him to the miserable tenement where Nora lies near death. The woman recognizes Vane and begs for information concerning her boy's whereabouts.

Upon her promise not to betray the secret, Vane points toward Raymond. Called to the bedside, a strange feeling of love and pity fills the boy's heart. A smile of happiness steals over the dying woman's face. Nor does Raymond ever know that it was his mother whose last moments he had eased.

"SHERLOCK BONEHEAD" (August 21).—Chief of Police Ivorytop and Chief of Detectives Sherlock Bonehead, of Rottenport, fall in love with Helen, a girl from the city. Ivorytop and Bonehead receive a visit from Bert Smith, Secret Service Agent, who informs them that $1,000 is offered for the capture of Captain Kidd, a smuggler. Determined to secure the reward, Ivorytop and Bonehead go on the trail. The two work independently. Seeing a suspicious-looking character sneaking up the mountainside, Bonehead and Ivorytop follow. Neither suspects that their quarry is Bert in disguise. The chief and the sleuth get into a fight, during which Bert disappears.

Accompanied by the entire police force, the two take up the trail again the following day. They see Bert, still in disguise, chasing another man. This individual leaps into a rowboat containing Helen and compels the girl to row the boat toward the other side of the stream. Leaping into another boat, Ivorytop, Bonehead and the police force take up the pursuit. Mere landlubbers, they experienced fifty-seven varieties of trouble, finally upsetting the craft. After floundering about in the stream, the officers swim to shore and get another boat.

Helen rows her captor to the shore. When the man turns his back for a moment the girl strikes him on the head with the oar, rendering him unconscious. At this moment, Bert runs up. Ivorytop and Bonehead arrive upon the scene in time to see Bert, who removes his disguise, snap the bracelets on the unconscious man's wrists. The rivals learn with dismay that Bert is Helen's sweetheart. But their anguish is deepened when they are informed that the handcuffed individual is none other tha Captain Kidd, and that the reward goes to Helen and the government detective.

"THE PRIMITIVE INSTINCT" (August 24).—Engrossed in experimental work, Dr. Walker neglects his wife and child. Elena comes to the conclusion that he no longer cares for her. Jack Tremond, an artist once a suitor for Elena's hand, learns the state of affairs. He urges the woman to elope with him, but Elena turns a deaf ear to his pleas. Her husband's neglect becomes unbearable. A sudden impluse rashly causes Elena to decide to leave him. After putting her child to sleep one evening, Elena places a note, giving the reasons for her step, on the nursery table. Meeting her husband while leaving the house, Elena informs him she intends to visit a friend.

The woman hastens to Jack's studio, but finds he has just left. Deciding to wait, she makes herself comfortable in an easy chair. A painting, depicting a primitive man attracts Elena's attention. The woman falls asleep while gazing at the picture. Elena dreams she sees the cave man win a mate in combat with a rival savage. Later, the primitive woman, believing herself neglected, becomes angry with her mate's interest in the fashioning of new weapons, and prepares to run away with his rival. Realization of his love comes when she sees him in fierce combat with a ferocious lion that menaces the safety of their child and herself.

Elena awakes with a start. The moral of her dream strikes home. The woman hastens from the studio just before Jack's return. In the meantime, a lamp accidentally upsets, sets fire to the nursery. His baby's screams bring Dr. Calker to the scene. After rescuing the child, Robert subdues the flames with his naked hands. Elena's letter is consumed in the fire. The wife returns home and learns what has transpired. Realizing the depths of his father-love, Elena kisses her husband's blistered hands.

"KIDNAPPED BY INDIANS" (August 22).—Captain Blake wins the gratitude of Wahnah and Chief Lone Pine when he knocks down Harding, who has insulted the Indian maid. Wahnah later falls in love with the army officer and asks him to marry her. Although fond of her, Blake informs Wahnah that the blood barrier makes this impossible. In Harding, Blake discovered an outlaw who has long defied capture. Thirsting for revenge, the desperado fires into the cabin which serves as Blake's headquarters. The bullet goes wild.

Later, Harding comes upon Wahnah. He seizes the girl in his arms. In the struggle which ensues, the man discovers a peculiar scar on Wahnah's right hand. The girl is amazed to see Harding stagger back and then flee. That afternoon, Blake enters a saloon where Harding and his gang are carousing. A clever ruse enables the army officer to capture the outlaws. The men are placed in the guardhouse. During the night, the sentry is slain and the desperadoes escape. Blake learns of this the following morning and goes in pursuit.

The army officer comes upon the outlaw chief. Both fire. Harding's bullet goes wild, while Blake's shot mortally wounds the outlaw. Wahnah, Chief Lone Pine and several of his tribe hear the shooting and hasten to the scene. Dying, Harding declares Wahnah to be his daughter. The girl had been kidnapped by Lone Pine and his Indians years before, following an attack upon a wagon train in which Mrs. Harding was slain. A bullet struck the girl upon the hand, inflicting a peculiarly-shaped wound. Lone Bear confirms the story which shows Wahnah to be of the white blood. With a glad cry, Blake seizes the girl in his arms.

THE RUSSIAN ZOO (OSANIA-NOVA) (August 3).—The Russian Zoo, world famous for its completeness, has some of the most curious and rare animal specimens in captivity. One of the most noted specimens of this kind is the wild horse, the first of its kind ever brought to Europe.

TRAINING ARMY DOGS (SWEDEN) (August 4).—Few people indeed think farther than guns, powder and ball, swords, etc., when army equipment is mentioned. In Sweden, however, not the least of the separate departments of the army is that devoted to the breeding and training of the army dog. For the military service it has been found that the most intelligent and versatile canine is the Airedale terrier. This little animal adopts himself wonderfully to the many tasks and hardships imposed upon him by the military service.

In training the dogs various stunts and devices are resorted to by the army officers to develope the dogs' sense of smell. Crawling, jumping and climbing exercises also form a part of the day's routine. Quite as important as the morning toilet which fits the dog for his arduous day's work in the campaign, is the feeding time at the kennels after a day's strenuous activity.

PATHE'S WEEKLY, NO. 48, 1914 (August 5).—Brooklyn Navy Yard, N. Y.—Arrival of U. S. Supply Ship "Celtic" with "Jackies" who did service in Mexico.

Budabest, Austro-Hungary.—Emperor Francis Joseph whose ultimatum to Servia threatens all Europe with war.

Nish, Servia.—King Peter I, of Servia, who refuses to bow to the Dual Monarchy's ultimatum.

St. Petersburg, Russia.—The Czar, who has served notice on all powers that Russia "cannot be indifferent" to any invasion of Servian territory.

Paris, France.—President Poincare, who with France must, by the terms of the Triple Entente, join Russia and England against the Teuton.

London, England.—King George V., whose Home Rule trouble cannot prevent Great Britain from becoming involved in the war as Russia's ally.

Berlin, Germany.—The Kaiser, in whose hand peace or war rests and who is throwing his powerful influence for peace.

Seattle, Wash.—A spectacular night fire destroys the excursion steamer Nelson on Lake Washington.

Vera Cruz, Mexico.—Lic. Roberto A. Ruiz, Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs under President Huerta, leaving for Havana with his family.

Long Island Sound.—A diver, equipped with the new diving apparatus invented by the Submarine Diving and Recovering Company, descends 212 feet—a new record.

Newport News, Va.—Seven hundred Greek officers and sailors arrive to arm the Battleship Mississippi sold to Greece by the U. S. Government.

A BASQUE WEDDING (August 4).—The wedding ceremonies of the natives of the Province of Basque, which lies in the Pyrenees Mountains near the Bay of Biscay, are peculiarly distinctive. Simple in the extreme without any of the costliness or show or honeymooning of the average ceremony, the Basque bride and groom, after enjoying a hearty breakfast, settle down immediately to quiet married life.

FROM GRENOBLE TO AIX LES BAINS (August 10).—Who has not heard of the wonderful French Alps? Exquisitely beautiful and quite unsurpassed in grandeur the giant mountains standing on every side of the tourist inspire awe and wonder at the accomplishments of nature. One of the most interesting of the many trips through this section is that from Grenoble to Aix Les Bains. Along the road one gets an excellent opportunity to observe the intricate and characteristic basic formations of the mountains.

At Sierroz the waterfalls and cataracts, resplendent in rainbow glory, are the common meeting place of all travellers. But one of the most beautiful and picturesque spots in all France is to be found at Lake Bourget. From the old side wheel steamer which makes excursion trips about the lake one is enable to secure a magnificent view of the surrounding country.

TYPICAL RUSSIAN DANCES (August 10).—Not newly discovered Brownies, but real Russian dwarfs, the leader of who is twenty-eight years old and less than two feet five inches tall, introduce themselves in various Russian dances. Most interesting of these is the sword dance performed by six little fellows no one of whom is over thirty inches in height.

THE ART OF THE FURRIER (August 11).—Mole skins so eagerly sought by the fashionable customer are prepared for the market by the hunter who frequently makes his entire livelihood from the sale of the pelts of these little animals. A simple but effective device is used to catch the mole. It consists of a snare made of a noose attached to a rod bent to form a spring. As he inspects his snares the mole-hunter finds several of them sprung. Taking the mole out he quickly kills it and skins it. He then spreads it open and tacks it to a small board where it soon becomes stiff and dry.

Before they can be used commercially the mole skins have to be treated chemically to soften and preserve them. After they are thoroughly dried the furrier trims them and joins them together in long strips. These are matched together according to the various shades and then shaped into various garments. The rich fine fur lined with costly silks and satins betokens but little its humble origin.

IRON AND STEEL INDUSTRY (BOMBAY) (August 11).—Bombay, usually slow to adopt modern methods, now possesses an iron and steel foundry equipped with the newest and most up-to-date machinery. In it are manufactured the various grades of steel used in Asiatic industries.

BIOGRAPH.

"THE MIX-UP AT MURPHY'S" (August 13).—A farce comedy. The tramp who stole the chicken and was pursued into town where contractor Murphy was giving a costume party, had a series of mistaken identity incidents with the fiance of Murphy's daughter who makes up as a tramp for the party.

"CURING MR. GOODHEART" (August 13).—A farce comedy. Mr. Goodheart is what his name describes, always ready to lend a helping hand to everyone, which results in misfortune for him at every turn, until finally, he is cured.

"A GAME OF FREEZE-OUT" (August 17).—Two lovers, annoyed by the persistency of a second admirer, plan to lock him up in the icebox. Strange as it may seem, the trick melts the icy heart of the girl and the lover who was out in the cold, now finds himself warmed by the girl's love.

"TIM, THE TERROR" (August 17).—Tim is a desperate outlaw who proves quite noble when he finds that a poor widow is in danger of eviction on account of a mortgage of $500 on her home, held by a Dutch magistrate. Tim gives himself up, gives her the reward, breaks out of jail and then makes his Dutch rival, the magistrate, eat the mortgage and marry him to the widow.

ECLAIR.

"THE MIRACLE" (August 16).—Phillippe, a hard-hearted but handsome young merchant, woos Anna, a beautiful French Canadian girl and in her hour of need deserts her. Crazed with grief she begs him to protect her name. He casts her off and she is stoned by the women of the village. At the Shrine of Saint Ann where they had plighted their troth, her baby dies and she becomes an outcast.

Years later in the same village two lovers are anxious to marry but are told by the priest to wait until the girl is cured of a deformity by a pilgrimage to Quebec. They go to old Phillippe for the money. But he refuses them. Wandering through the woods they kneel and pray at the image of Saint Ann. A little later Phillippe coming upon the scene of his false vow is confronted by the woman whom he had wronged now old and dying. The meeting is too much for him and he dies. The woman places his gold at the foot of the image and falls across his body.

The lovers coming to the shrine find the gold of the wretched Phillippe and believing a miracle has been wrought by their prayers prepare joyously for their pilgrimage to Quebec.

"BRANSFORD IN ARCADIA, OR THE LITTLE EOHIPPUS" (Three Parts—August 19).—Heff Bransford, a wild and daring but manly cowboy, falls violently in love with Eleanor Hoffman, a pretty city girl who is visiting the Lakes. Young Herbert Lake, president of a local bank and an unscrupulous fellow, is also in love with the girl. To complicate matters, Johnny Dines, the good pal and firm friend of Jeff Bransford, has lost his heart to Eleanor also.

A masquerade ball is given and on a dare from Eleanor, Jeff attends uninvited in a football costume. That same night Lake steals back to his bank from the masquerade party and steals a large sum of money which had been left in his care. To avoid suspicion and implicate Jeff, he places the football nose-guard, which the cowboy had worn, outside the safe. Making his exit, he encounters a watchman whom he shoots and mortally injures.

Soon after the crime is discovered, the nose-guard is found. Jeff is accused and brought to trial. In court his friends pave the way for an escape. He flees to the mountains. Johnny Dines and his friends set themselves to the task of clearing Bransford.

Adventures follow. Jeff experiences many narrow escapes, but finally reaches the border disguised as an old miner. He is accompanied on this trip and aided by a strange young fellow who has proven to be a staunch friend. On separating with him at the border, Bransford gives him a miniature horse which Eleanor had given him some time before.

Meanwhile Johnny and his pals have traced the crime to Lake. Dines brings the news to Jeff. To test Eleanor's love, Jeff returns disguised by a beard which he has grown. At a party given by Eleanor, he is to take part in the entertainment and shaves off his beard, substituting a false one. He appears in the football costume worn at the masquerade and Eleanor, thinking Jeff has returned, dresses in the clothes she wore when accompanying him to the border; for it was she who had disguised herself as a man in order to be with Bransford. Jeff is overjoyed at seeing the young fellow who had saved him; revelations come thick and fast and Jeff Bransford, his name cleared and possessed of a fortune which he has struck in the mines, claims the pretty city girl as his own.

"THE DIAMOND NIPPERS" (August 22).—Shultz and Stein arrive at Far-away Beach for a week's end with their wives. The two hubbys immediately head for the hotel bar, leaving their wives to rave. Well aware of the reception awaiting them at the hotel they seek to soothe their wives by purchasing for each a diamond necklace from a street faker.

The police have been warned to be on the watch for a pair of notorious diamond nippers—Stella and Steve—a reward for whose capture is offered. This pair of thieves spot Schultz and Stein's wives wearing the supposed valuable necklaces at the hotel lawn party and scheme to rob them.

Stella then lures Schultz and Stein out for a row in order to leave the coast clear for Steve. Steve secures the necklace but in doing so, bungles the job. The police corner him on the end of the pier and, desperate, he flings the jewelry down to Stella, who happens to be rowing by with Schultz and Stein. The jewelry, however, falls into the ocean and Stella to recover it sets her two ardent admirers diving for it.

Steve, to escape, jumps into the ocean and is rescued by Stella; they row away. The police then capture Schultz and Stein, the latter now having recovered the jewelry. They are arrested as diamond thieves. Meanwhile the wives have blamed the hotel manager for their loss. They make him pay dearly and then start in to enjoy life with the proceeds. The real diamond nippers are finally caught and Schultz and Stein are released. Then the indignant hotel manager forcibly recovers his money and kicks the trouble makers off his grounds. Schultz and Stein and their wives, however, go home happy for quite unexpectedly they are presented with the one thousand dollars reward for being instrumental in the capture of Stella and Steve.

"PASS KEY NO. 2" (August 19).—Wife wants to go to the dance. Hubby won't. Wife confides her troubles to her friend in the apartment next to her. They decide to go to the dance with friend's intended. An old bachelor in the apartment goes to the dance also. As he is leaving the apartment he finds a pass key which the careless maid has dropped and puts it in his pocket, intending to return it to the maid. He leaves for the dance. Later wife and her friend arrive. The bachelor takes the best friend to the punch bowl, making her intended jealous. Hubby has discovered his wife's absence, and follows to the dance. The intended is using wife as a tool to make the best friend jealous. Hubby is enraged. The bachelor finishes the punch with honors, carrying home an overload. Wife leaves the dance, arriving home only to find the bachelor calmly reposing in her apartment. Wife hides in the bachelor's room, believing burglars have entered her apartment.

The Bachelor seekng to quench his thirst, seeks the ice water in the hall. He returns to the best friend's apartment. The intended returns only to see the bachelor coming out of his fiance's apartment. He hides in wife's apartment. Best friend returns. Finding her apartment open she thinks burglars are at work. She dashes down the hall into the arms of hubby. Wife hears and leaves her hiding place to fight for her rights. So does the intended. Bachelor tangles with the water urn. The two roomers cling to their respective men. Bachelor reveals himself with the pass key and the mystery is cleared.

"THE HOLE IN THE GARDEN WALL" (August 23).—Elsie and Rupert, people of independence, live next door to one another. Their houses are divided by a garden wall. Rupert and Joe are suitors for the hand of Elsie. Rupert writes a letter to her, asking her to wear a rose of white if her answer is yes, and a rose of red should her answer be no. Joe reads the letter before it is sealed and substitute the word white for red. Elsie, who really loves Rupert, and thinking that the red rose means happiness to him, pins the white rose in Joe's coat and wears the red herself. Rupert is broken hearted. Not waiting an explanation he disappears.

Ten years after we find him in a rough mining room. A baby has been left fatherless and motherless. Rupert volunteers to adopt the child. Four years later he returns to his home. Elsie has not married, living true to her love for Rupert. The child now four years of age, finds a hole in the garden wall and crawls through. He finds Elsie grown older and sad, sitting in the garden. They become great friends. The child takes a photo of Elsie which he finds on her bedroom table, crawls through the hole in the wall and gives it to Rupert. The child, says the lady next door sent it to him. The child then takes Rupert's photo from his room and carries it to Elsie with the same message. Rupert is delighted to get Elsie's picture and sends a note by the child, expressing his gratitude to her for her thoughtfulness after all these years. As the child enters to deliver Rupert's note Elsie gives the child one for Rupert, the child takes her note first, then hands Rupert's and runs away. The child gives Rupert the note which reads almost identical with his own, to Elsie. Both Rupert and Elsie run to the garden wall to explain and there the happy reunion takes place.

"A BOWL OF ROSES" (August 20).—The story of the memories of past lovers aroused in a young society man by a bowl of roses. The white rose reminds him of the pure love, temporarily misunderstood, of the gentle woman now his wife. The tea rose brings up memories of the heartless society belle who set his love at naught and quickly turned to others of her set. The American Beauty recalls the stunning actress, at one time his heart's ideal, but at the last found unworthy of his great love. The pink rose reminds him of the unchaste love of the wife of another man, which he too readily accepted. He is recalled from his reminiscences and ponderings by the voice of his own white rose, his own sweet wife, who carries in her loving, mothering arms the tiny rosebud bit of life unfolding—his child.

"THE SLAVEY'S ROMANCE" (August 21).—Paul Mason has perfected an invention, but lacks the money to patent it. Pressed for cash, he is threatened with being put out of his boarding house. Anna, the little slavey, who secretly loves him, takes some of her own savings and gives it to the landlady, saying that Paul had paid it on account.

Paul visits the Globe Manufacturing Company only to have the manager laugh at his invention. However, the manager realizes its value and when Paul goes he has one of his clerks follow him. In the boarding house the clerk takes a room where he can spy on Paul. It is not until several days later that Paul discovers that Anna, the little slavey, loves him. The clerk tries to steal the plans, but Anna interferes.

Later, the clerk is advised to try and buy the plans. Paul is about to accept the offer when Anna receives a legacy from a distant relative in the old country and comes to his rescue. She offers to go into partnership. The invention is patented and the manager of the Globe Manufacturing Company, recognizing the advantages to his firm, offers Paul a remunerative position and a royalty on his device. Paul accepts, after making Anna a partner for life.

"WEIGHTS AND MEASURES" (Two Parts—August 17).—John M. Truxton, City Attorney, has gathered evidence to prosecute the men higher up. The newspaper publishes a warning of what is to happen at the next session of the grand jury. Mayor Dave Harris, the political boss, reads the account. He immediately goes to Truxton's office to find out whether the story is true. Upon being assured that it is, he tries to stop Truxton from presenting his evidence, first by bribery and then by threats. Truxton refuses all offers and finally kicks Harris out of his office.

Kitty Donely, through certain circumstances, is in the power of the mayor. She is approached and told to get something on Truxton. Kitty refuses at first. The mayor tells her to get Truxton and he will give her five thousand dollars, and if she doesn't he will surely get her. Kitty agrees and discovers the next day that Truxton is in the habit of going almost every day for a motor trip and stopping for a drink of water at an old farm house. The next day she persuades the old farmer to take her in as a summer boarder; changing her finery for a simple gingham dress, she meets Truxton as he comes and Truxton falls in love with her and proposes marriage to Kitty; she then discovers that she loves him. Truxton by accident overhears some of her conversation. Fighting a battle with himself, he decides that Kitty is worth more than anything else. He calls on her again that night. Kitty, going for his cigarette case, discovers a letter written by Truxton to his mother which he has forgotten to mail. Kitty thinks it is to his wife. In revenge for what she thinks is his perfidy, she pulls the badger game on him. Truxton, thinking she has fallen for the mayor's offer of bribery, is more hurt than frightened. The next day the papers come out with scare heads, announcing the arrest and release on bond of the City Attorney, charged with a statutory offense.

The mayor sends Kitty her promised check. She drops both the letter she has taken from Truxton and the check, into the library table drawer.

Truxton gets a letter from his mother, asking why he does not write. Truxton, thinking matters over, decides to unravel things and that night enters the mayor's home with the aid of a jimmy, searching for evidence. He finds the mayor's check book and on one of the stubs "K. D.—$5,000." Putting two and two together, he enters Kitty's apartment in the same way he did the mayor's. He finds his missing letter and a check for five thousand dollars, signed by the mayor. Kitty appears upon the scene. Explanations and forgiveness follow. A month later the scales are balanced. The mayor is indicted through evidence furnished by Truxton, and Truxton and Kitty drink once more in happiness at the old well.

"MAN AND HIS BROTHER" (Two Parts—August 3).—Under the stress of certain circumstances which will be explained in this story, Jack Edmond is a vagabond, tramping his way through the cattle country, looking for work. By removing a thorn from the foot of a shepherd dog which belongs to Eleanor, the daughter of John Hess, he gains her friendship and she secures him a position on her father's ranch.

Ned Emmet, sheriff, sees Jack at work and recognizes him. He hastens to inform John Hess that Jack is an ex-convict. Jack is discharged. Eleanor sees Jack leaving the ranch and asks him to explain. He tells her the truth, and she demands that he tell her all about it. Jack tells her the cause of his imprisonment, as follows:

Jack and his brother, Wess, were very fond of each other, and they were both working on a ranch owned by George Hutton. Wess was in love with Hutton's wife, and was in the habit of meeting her in secret. Jack, of course, knew nothing of this. Mr. Hutton discovered the relationship between Wess and his wife and a quarrel followed. Wess gets away from the ranch house, and is followed to his bunk house by the angry Hutton. Jack, knowing nothing of what has happened, sees Hutton leveling his revolver at Wess and he (Jack) shoots Hutton down. Wess, not stopping to explain, makes an escape, and Jack is sent up for the crime Later, Mrs. Hutton, recovering from the prostrating shock of the whole affair, explains things and Jack is released from prison.

Eleanor, having heard Jack's story, believes it, and makes him return with her to her father. News comes at this time that Ned Emmet, the sheriff, has been killed by a dangerous outlaw, whom the sheriff has been trying to capture for some time. Jack is anxious to make good with Helen and her father, so he volunteers to go out and bring back the bad man or not return at all. He leaves, and after several days of scouting, comes upon his man.

Helen, being fond of hunting, has gone on a day's journey of her own into the mountains. She comes upon Jack and the bandit at the moment of capture. She remains in concealment and is ready to use her rifle if necessary. Jack knows nothing of her presence. A struggle takes place between the two men, but does not last long—there is a recognition between them. Jack discovers that the bandit is his brother. Jack realizes that his errand is a failure, and with a promise from his brother that will change his ways, he lets him go free. Jack realizes that his hopes in regard to Eleanor and her father are dead ones, and he wearily turns in a different direction from that taken by his brother.

UNIVERSAL IKE.

"UNIVERSAL IKE, JR.'S LEGACY" (August 4).—Following their elopement, Ike and Louise are captured by the sheriff, and with the girl's mother and father, all go to a hotel for the night. The sheriff takes charge of his two prisoners and locks them in adjoining rooms. They discover a fire escape. While they are planning their getaway, the old folks are preparing for bed. Mother takes her Sunday hair off and pins it on the window curtain. The goat devours it. Mother then rushes the goat into the sheriff's room. He ties the goat to the bed and goes to sleep. Billy eats the sheriff's whiskers.

Ike and Louise are making their way down the fire escape when a lady mistakes them for burglars and shoots. The young couple climb to the roof.

In the meantime the sheriff decides to turn in, but has difficulty in putting out his electric light. Finally he covers it with his coat. It works well for a time, but soon catches on fire.

The old lady smells smoke, shakes the old man and they start on a rampage. Arriving at Louise's door they find out the young couple have once more escaped. In the meantime the goat crawls out of the window on a painter's scaffold and crosses to a roof. The sheriff pursues, but the ladder falls, leaving him without any way to get down. The kids on a roof higher up see his position and tell him they will lower a rope to his assistance if he will marry them. While considering, he warns the old people of their whereabouts and finally decides to accept their aid on such conditions.

POWERS.

"THE DIVORCEE" (August 21).—Mrs. Darcy, after she divorces from her worthless inebriate husband, finds she must earn her own living. She sees an advertisement for a cook at a summer home in the mountains. Answering it she secures the situation. She makes good and her dinners are the pride of her mistress. The butler, however, falls in love with her. The young men guests desert the young ladies of the party for the society of the cook. To cap the climax, her former husband discovers her and calls in an endeavor to persuade her to return to him. During his visit he helps himself freely from the stock on the sideboard, becomes maudlin and finally falls asleep. A letter falls from his pocket and she finds it is addressed to herself, telling her of a comfortable fortune left her by a relative.

The young catch of the season becomes tired of the dinner dance and steals away to have a quiet chat with the cook. She asks him to assist her in disposing of the husband and he kindly dumps him in a neighboring ditch. In the morning she leaves without notice, but the audience is left to suppose that later the young lawyer will permanently engage her.

IMP.

"ON THE HIGH SEAS" (Two Reels—August 20).—The captain of the schooner was a drunkard. His first mate was a bully and also a heavy drinker. There was hardly a man on the old wooden vessel who would not plunge his knife into the other fellow's back. Into this ship, among the crowd of brutal, unprincipled men Mr. Marshall, rich ship-owner, sent his son to reform him—"to make a man of him."

His instructions to the captain were to make the boy work and put some ginger into him. In time Jim meets the captain's daughter, Elsie, and as the days pass by, he comes to love her. Elsie returns this love.

Van, the mate, is also in love with the girl and he views with disgust and jealousy the attentions she receives from Jim. The latter has been forced into the rough garments of sailors and made to work. The ship is only out a short time when the captain reveals his true nature; he begins to drink heavily. The ship is practically left in charge of Van, the mate. Van ill-treats his sailors and a forty-foot fall results when he sends a man, against reason, out onto the bow-sprit.

Time comes when Van and Jim clash; there is a fight. Van gets the worst of it and furious because Elsie laughs at him, he hunts the captain out and tells him there is mutiny aboard. Jim is ordered into irons. The sailors refuse to obey the order. Van shoots the captain and lays the guilt onto Jim.

Jim is threatened for murder on the high seas; there is only one who believes in him—the girl—even though her own father was the victim. The captain is buried and holds the secret. The rest of the story deals with Elsie, Van and Jim, still on the boat. Van takes to drink and bullies the crew unmercifully. Elsie in the end finds out that he is the murderer, and that the captain was stabbed to death besides being shot. All this ends with a confession under peculiar circumstances, freeing Jim and making Elsie happy.

101 BISON.

"THE LURE OF THE GEISHA" (Two Parts—August 22).—Captain Clifford, U. S. A., arrives at Yokohama and is met by Marie Wilson, his fiancee and daughter of United States Ambassador Wilson. The coming of Clifford is looked upon with keen displeasure by Bainbridge, Secretary of Ambassador Wilson, who himself is in love with Marie. Shortly after his arrival Clifford meets an old acquaintance, Captain Amato of the Japanese navy.

Bainbridge is on friendly terms with Amato and as a result of his growing jealousy of Clifford he tries to convince Amato that Clifford is a spy. Amato casts the idea aside as absurd. Bainbridge then begins the execution of a plot which will clinch his defamatory charges against Clifford. Amato loves Yama, a Geisha girl. Bainbridge takes advantage of this and leads the American officer to a tea garden where he introduces him to Yama as an American millionaire. Clifford develops merely a passing interest for the Geisha girl. He is seen in her company by Amato and the Japanese officer's jealousy is aroused.

Bainbridge's next move is to induce Clifford to visit the navy with him. While Clifford is examining a large gun Bainbridge whispers in Amato's ear and the Japanese officer begins to believe that possibly there is some truth in Bainbridge's accusation.

Later, when Clifford and Bainbridge visit the tea garden, they are followed by one of Amato's servants. In a mood of jealousy Amato rushes to the place. He finds Clifford with Yama. Hot words and accusations follow. Amato, overcome by his anger, draws a dagger. At this crucial moment Yama steps between the two men and receives the dagger thrust in her own bosom. Amato is stunned. He hurries home in a fit of remorse. Bainbridge hurries to the street and circulates the report that Clifford has slain Yama. Clifford has a hard time fighting his way through the angry mob to the American consulate. The Ambassador believes him guilty and promises the angry mob that he will be punished.

However, in investigating the killing of Yama, the Ambassador finds that she was slain with Amato's dagger. Hurrying to Amato's house he finds the Japanese dying as the result of an attempt to commit suicide. Amato exposes Bainbridge. Before the Ambassador can interfere Bainbridge is slain by the angry mob. Clifford is acquitted of all discredit in the affair and regains his good standing with Marie.

"RESCUED BY WIRELESS" (Two Parts—August 8).—Morgan, a missionary, and his daughter, Marie, sail from Honolulu on the government ship "Thetis," bound for Koko Island. Capt. Clifford, who is going to investigate Koko Island as a site for a military post, is also a passenger. Another passenger is Bainbridge, a wireless operator, en route to the island to take charge of a wireless station. Acquaintance ripens rapidly aboard ship, and after the "Thetis" has been to sea but a few days Clifford and Bainbridge begin to vie for Marie's favor.

Although Marie prefers the company of Clifford, she readily gives her friendship to Bainbridge, and before she has been on the island a month she has learned to operate the wireless instruments. Bainbridge associates with the natives and has many friends among them. One day he is overcome by headache and drinks of the intoxicating drug, awa, as a remedy. He likes the effect of the poison, and soon he has become a habituate.

In the meantime Clifford has completed his investigations and sails from the island with his soldiers.

His suit rejected by Marie, Bainbridge incites the natives to attack the missionaries. All become drunk on awa and the home of the missionaries is assaulted. Bainbridge abducts Marie, and the other missionaries are taken prisoners. During a moment when she is not being watched, Marie steals into the wireless station and sends a message of appeal to Capt. Clifford aboard the "Thetis." Bainbridge discovers her purpose. Surmising the contents of her message, Bainbridge has his prisoners removed to the mountains. Clifford arrives with his soldiers and a terrific battle ensues between the soldiers and the armed natives, led by Bainbridge. Clifford's command is victorious. Marie is rescued and Bainbridge pays for his perfidy with his life.

"THE TREY O' HEARTS" (Part III).—"THE SEAVENTURE" (Two Reels—August 18).—Judith catches the same train with Alan and Rose for Portland. Hearing a messenger calling for Alan Law with a telegram she learns that it informs Alan that he will not be able to get through sleeper reservations to New York. Returning the message to the messenger she also gives him a second envelope. Alan reads the message and then opening the second envelope finds it contains a trey o' hearts.

Arriving in Portland, they are driven to a hotel. Judith secures the room next to Rose and picks the lock of the connecting door. With the aid of her confederates she chloroforms Rose and dons her clothing. Alan has proceeded to the water front and engages the yacht, Seaventure, to take Rose and himself to New York. All his plans being reported to Judith by her confederates, she then engages a fishing boat to intercept the Seaventure on its voyage to New York. Passing herself off as Rose she gets aboard with Alan. She opens the valves of the auxiliary gasoline tanks and allows the gasoline to flood the hold. Later she sights the fishermen and upon its approach she covers Barcus, the owner of the Seaventure, who is the only one on deck, with her revolver. He grapples with her. Alan, hearing the disturbance, hurries on deck. He succeeds in getting Judith below and explains to Barcus that the woman must be partly insane. Calling Judith on deck and being alarmed at the nearness of the fishing vessel, he asks her if she has friends aboard the fisherman. She affirms and he signifies that she shall get over the side into the dory. She casts off and is picked up by the fisherman. Barcus going below learns the true state of affairs aboard the Seaventure, viz., that the gasoline tanks have emptied themselves into the bilge. Then follows a race between the yacht and the fisherman, the latter pursuing full tilt. Towards sunset both are becalmed, the Seaventure lying about one mile farther out. Barcus watches the fisherman through his binoculars and observes the power launch lowered, into which Judith accompanies one companion. They are seen to be working over some sort of apparatus and finally, lighting a fuse, they lash the wheel of the launch and put off the fisherman in the dory. The launch has been set at full speed ahead and is rushing straight for the Seaventure. Barcus, suspecting what it means, drags Alan to the farther rail and they dive overboard, just before the Seaventure and the unmanned launch are blown sky-high. They swim ashore and fall asleep from exhaustion.

FRONTIER.

"THE SILENT CALL" (August 23).—Arthur ranks high in Dolly's affections until Walter, a stranger, meets and fascinates her. Willis, the father, finds a man laying in the street, apparently dead. When he returns with the sheriff the man is gone.

Willis approves of Walter as a suitor for his daughter. Knowing this, Dolly accepts his proposition that they be married quietly and then surprise Willis. For several days Willis has been bothered by a sun spot that has been flashed in his window. At first he imagined that Dolly was only playing a prank. She convinced him otherwise. Finally he informed the sheriff.

At the minister's house, Walter finds that he has forgotten to provide himself with a ring, and leaves to purchase one. As Willis is talking to the sheriff the sun spot is flashed in his eyes. They finally discover its origin. In an old shanty they find Joe, a prisoner, guarded by Charlie, a crook. In Joe Willis recognizes the man he saw laying on the street. Walter returns with the ring. Joe seeing him entering the house recognizes him as his brother and runs after him, the others following. Dolly is surprised when she learns that Joe is Walter's brother. She tells the others that only that afternoon Walter has shown her a letter from a firm of attorneys to the effect that brother Joseph was presumably dead, as they had been unable to find any trace of him, and that according to the terms of his father's will should Joe not be found and the estate claimed by him by the first of July, that the estate would revert to Walter. The sheriff sees through the whole thing and tells Walter that he had better come along with him. Walter confesses that it was he who caused his brother to be kept a prisoner.

Dolly's romance is of course shattered. To the faithful suitor Arthur, whom she rejected for Walter, she states that perhaps sometimes she will consider his proposal favorably.

NESTOR.

"THE CREEPING FLAME" (August 19).—Wilbur is foreman of a mine in the western country. Jane, his sweetheart, lives on a nearby ranch. One day she rides over to the mine. While they are talking the miners enter and jokingly remind Wilbur that it is pay day. The foreman allows Jane to pay off the men. The boys leave for a holiday in town. The foreman, too, plans to take a day off and starts to saddle his horse. Suddenly he gashes his arm. The blood spurts from the deep wound. He tries in vain to staunch it. Jane ties her scarf around the wound, but the blood flows too strongly. She rides for the doctor.

Teh foreman, too weak from loss of blood to walk, lies on a pile of straw. Finally he lights a cigarette, carelessly throwing the match down. Instantly the straw is alight and burning toward him. Painfully he drags himself out to the cool powder house. The fire creeps closer. Jane and the doctor are coming. The red flames are licking the side of the powder house.

The foreman, now almost unconscious, is just the other side of the partition. Jane and the doctor arrive. A feeble call tells them where the wounded man is. Just in time they rescue him. The powder house is blown to atoms a moment later.

"A LUCKY DECEPTION" (Two Reels—August 21).—They looked upon the wine when it was red and into the lady's eyes when they sparkled, and when they regained consciousness Bob and Lee, his chum, found themselves in a vile dungeon cell playing tag with cockroaches.

Shortly following the incarceration, a fuzzy-faced professor from the college invaded the jail and after arranging for the liberation of the two miscreants, informed them that each had been expelled from the school. When Bob reached home the news of his disgrace had preceded him.

His father forced him to accept a proposition to marry and settle down to a quiet life within a month and receive $5,000 or be disinherited.

Bob carried the news to Lee. Lee had made a hit as a woman impersonator in their college plays and this was his opportunity to vindicate himself as an actor.

Bob introduced Lee as his prospective wife. His father, mother and sister were delighted. Within a month the solemn ceremony was performed. The happy couple settled in a new bungalow. However, Lee began to tire of the role he was playing. Bob's sister and her friend Alice, came to visit the newlyweds. Lee was placed in a most delicate position when the two girls began to talk confidentially.

Lee fell in love with Bob's sister. On the other hand, Bob fell in love with Alice. She refused to listen to advances from a married man.

Finally Lee became desperate. He discarded his wig and skirts, dressed as a man and left the house. Alice saw a man leaving and immediately suspected Bob's wife of perfidy. An investigation was made. Bob swore his wife had eloped. The father and mother arrived to console Bob. His embarrassment came to a climax when Alice discovered Lee's wig and skirts in a bureau drawer.

Bob confessed to the deception but offered to make up for his transgression by immediately marrying Alice. She was more than willing and Bob's sister held the same sentiments in regard to Lee.

customers. He calls the clerk down and tries to wait on the customers himself. In comes a traveling salesman. Reuben's wife finds she needs something at the store. When she arrives she finds her husband too busy to wait on her. She looks around and flirts with the traveling salesman. When the customers leave, Reuben sees the salesman and his wife flirting. He kicks the salesman out. The wife naturally feels sorry for the salesman. He apologizes for the trouble he has caused her. The constable sees them talking and informs Reuben. Reuben shoots the place up. The salesman escapes. In the meantime, a burglar, dressed similar to the salesman comes out of the window. The constable starts on his trail. He runs into the salesman who is about to take a swim. The constable takes the salesman's clothes. The salesman escapes. Running to the house he jumps through a window and sneaks under the bed. Reuben comes home and starts talking to his wife about her past doings. To his surprise he feels hands on his foot. Pulling the salesman out from under the bed, he starts shooting. The salesman escapes, but is pursued.

"LOST IN THE STUDIO" (August 17).—Billy, arriving in the morning at the studio, greets Mr. Thornby, his director. Going to his dressing room, he gets ready and walks around kidding with the other boys. Ford Sterling arriving, greets Billy, who follows Sterling to his dressing room, peppering him with questions. Sterling asks him to vacate. Billy being a gentleman, does so. Deciding to visit some old friends, he parades over to the Universal studio; meeting them, he has a good time and goes home. Seeing the new cameraman putting candy in his plate case, Billy watches him and backs into a scene directed by Ford Sterling, spoiling several feet of film. Owing to Billy's wonderful smile, Mr. Sterling forgives. Billy going over to the case when the cameraman is not looking, opens it. Observing the cameraman turning, he quickly shuts it. In opening it to get a plate, the cameraman discovers the plate is spoiled. Taking the case, he goes to the vault to get a new supply, Billy following him. When the cameraman comes out of the vault, Billy notices he forgot the case, so he walks in to get the candy. By this time the watchman is making his rounds. Noticing that the vault door has been left open, he locks it, imprisoning Little Billy. Mr. Thornby, needing Billy for a scene notices his absence and starts on a hunt. Every available person on the grounds is made to help search for lost Billy. They look everywhere and cause a general riot in and around the place. The vault is the only place left. On opening it, Little Billy comes out crying.

"A RACE FOR LIFE" (August 3.)—Billy's mother, finished making pies, lays them in the window to cool. Billy, observing this, decides to steal one. This done, he offers Chandler a friend, part of a pie. Walking along, the pair observe Carmen, who has just finished a ride with Gordon. Chandler offers Carmen part of his pie. Gordon, jealous, knocks it from her hands. For this Carmen is angry. While Gordon and Chandler fight Billy pushes his suit with the girl. Later, Billy's mother discovers one of her pies missing, finds the guilty Billy, takes him home and puts him to bed.

That night Billy dreams. He dreams of Gordon trying to force his attentions upon Carmen, of Chandler rebuking him and of Gordon's threat to secure the girl at all costs. In his dream he sees Gordon abduct the girl, carry her away on a handcar and then tie her to the track when she refuses to marry the villain. Billy, enlisting the help of a friend and his racing car, starts to the rescue. There is a wild ride—a race between engine and motor car. Billy, in the car, dashes before the onrushing train and saves Carmen and restores her to Chandler.

Then Billy awakens.

"A DRAMATIC MISTAKE" (August 6).—Snitz is so ardent an admirer of the stage that he overlooks such small trifles as rent. The landlady asks his wife for the rent. After strong persuasion from the landlady's husband, who is also too strong to work, Snitz starts in search of a job. Naturally he turns to the stage as an appropriate vocation. He applies at the local temple of Thespis, but in spite of his showing samples of applied histrionics, he is cruelly turned down. He returns home discouraged.

In the meantime the leading man of the troupe, which is about to play Virginius, becomes incapacitated through too frequent visits with John Barleycorn. The stage manager is in desperation and takes the costume and part to Snitz with instructions to prepare for the matinee performance at once. Snitz rehearses with so much enthusiasm that the people of the house decide that a murder is being committed and call in the police. Snitz escapes and runs to the theater, where the audience is impatiently waiting for the arrival of Virginius. Virginius arrives, followed by the police, with exciting results both to Snitz and the audience.

"VIVIAN'S FIRST FELLOW" (August 18).—Vivian lives on a farm. Don, one of the farm hands, is smitten on her. Vivian meets Burke. Don becomes jealous when he sees that Burke has the inside track. Don learns that they intend eloping in an auto. He tells the sheriff and they try to stop them by stretching a rope across the road. It only ends in disaster for Don and the sheriff. The eloping couple finally get married. Burke buys Vivian lots of fine clothes and the little country girl is delighted, though not being used to the ways of society, she makes many blunders. Vivian meets a dude, and is won by his charms. Burke catches them, and he and the dude fight a duel.

Ma learns that Vivian has run away with Burke, so she goes in pursuit of them, unaware that they have been married. She catches Burke and is clubbing him when Vivian tells her that she has married Burke. Ma excuses her, but as her anger has been aroused she feels that she must vent it on someone so she goes after Don, who started the trouble.

"A LESSON IN MECHANICS" (August 21).—Ruth Wilson, daughter of a wealthy landowner, receives a visit from her country sweetheart, Joe Merriam, who is a motor boat enthusiast. Unknown to anyone but her brother Frank, Ruth is an expert at fixing auto and motor boat engines as the estate is on the bay and Ruth has the use of two launches. With Joe she goes for a boat ride but the engine breaks down and he is unable to fix it, and afraid that it would lower his opinion of her if she should repair the engine, she lets him call another boat to tow them back to the wharf. Merriam, while in love with Ruth, cannot bring himself to propose, fearing that she would be too ornamental for a farmer's wife, and half of his visit passes while he attempts to make up his mind. Finally, the last day of his visit arrives and he is still undecided. At the request of Ruth's father she and Joe take the launch across the bay to bring back the money for the servants' pay roll. While Joe is at the bank, Ruth remains at the town wharf and is accosted by a couple of toughs who demand the expensive rings she is wearing. At Joe's return they slink off, but watching the launch on its return set it adrift with the engine dead. In a row boat they follow to board the launch and secure the money and Ruth's jewelry. Joe, unable to repair the engine, gives battle to the toughs to prevent them from gaining the launch but he is being forced down when Ruth, realizing their desperate plight, begins to work on the engine. Just as the toughs are about to overcome Joe, she has the engine repaired and starts the launch, leaving the toughs far behind. Joe, seeing her with her hands and face covered with grease from the engine, realizes that he has misjudged her, and proposes on the spot. At her acceptance he takes her in his arms, grease and all.

"FRENCHY" (Two Parts—August 30).—Nash, a rancher, takes his little daughter May to her grandmother's for a visit and on his way back to the ranch meets Frenchy, a stranger, who has just ridden into the valley. He invites Frenchy to the ranch for dinner and then offers him work as a cowhand, which Frenchy accepts. Bess, Nash's other daughter, becomes friends with Frenchy and arouses the jealousy of Logan, the foreman of the ranch, who is in love with her. On account of his polite manner and his style of dress the stranger is ridiculed by the punchers, who make things as hard for him as possible. Logan, growing more jealous as the days pass, runs Frenchy's horse away from the ranch and dares him to ride an outlaw, hoping to see him injured and show him up before the others. Frenchy masters the horse, and in a quarrel with Logan shows that he is quicker on the draw than the foreman. The boys go to town to attend a dance and Frenchy buys some new clothes for the affair. In the saloon he meets Logan, who takes exception to his style of dress and in a quarrel which follows, shoots at Frenchy but merely grazes his check. To show his own marksmanship Frenchy shoots out a couple of the lights and then returning Logan's gun to him, dares him to draw. The foreman's nerve fails him and he leaves the saloon, where Frenhcy is making friends with the boys on account of his gameness. On the way back to the ranch the boys leave Frenchy asleep at the watering hole, thinking to play a joke on him, but Frenchy's horse wanders away and to turn the joke on the boys he walks back to town and puts up at the hotel. The horse reaches the ranch riderless and Nash, fearing for Frenchy's safety, orders a search. After two days he rides into town to enlist the sheriff's aid in locating Frenchy and finds him sitting on the hotel steps enjoying a cigarette and the joke. Angered, Nash discharges him and orders him to return to the ranch for his packs. On the way home Nash stops for his daughter, May, and during the trip she becomes very ill. The ranch is reached and Logan is sent for a doctor but finds him gone. Frenchy arriving at the ranch learns of the child's illness and taking a medical kit from his packs saves her life. Nash, ashamed of his rudeness, entreats Frenchy to make the ranch his home, but he refuses and rides away.

RELIANCE.

"THE BANK BURGLAR'S FATE" (Two Parts—August 8).—The advance man for Brooklyn Red's gang of burglars, disguised as a tramp, comes to Greenfield and sizes up the town, preparatory to robbing the bank. He wires his confederates to meet him at a camp outside the village. There they make the explosive for blowing up the safe. After a series of exciting incidents they bind and gag the young woman in the telephone office and loot the bank.

The girl at the switch-board manages to free herself and warn the marshal, but though pursued by an armed posse, the robbers make their getaway. Later, the Bankers' Protective Association does some clever detective work, locating the gang and arresting all the members, each of whom is sentenced to thirty years at hard labor.

"SO SHINES A GOOD DEED" (August 12).—An escaped convict is hiding near a cabin when he sees the man of the house bid his wife goodbye, mount his horse and ride away. He goes down to the cottage, and the woman, believing him to be a belated member of the sheriff's posse, hospitably invites him in to have a bite to eat before riding on to overtake her husband, who has gone on the trail of a famous criminal for whom a large reward is offered.

Among the baby's toys the stranger discovers a little wooden cart which he made for his own sister Mary thirty years before. It reveals to him the identity of this worn, sickly little woman who has been so kind to him. When the husband returns, after a fruitless search in the hills, he gives himself up. The husband receives the reward, and the brother rejoices in his sacrifice.

"OUR MUTUAL GIRL" (No. 30—August 10).—It is Margaret's eighteenth birthday anniversary, and her aunt goes to Tiffany's for a costly cameo necklace as a birthday present for her charming niece. She is followed by the thief who owns the trained dog. Some hours after she has given Margaret the present, the thief goes back to Mrs. Kinckerbocker's house, engages the butler in conversation at the door, and allows the police dog to sneak into the house.

Anni, the dog, has been trained to follow a person through the odor of personal belongings, and one of Margaret's handkerchiefs, sniffed by the intelligent animal, is sufficient to take it to her boudoir. There it hides, awaiting her return.

Margaret, after a busy and fatiguing day, consequent upon having so many friends call, goes to bed with the precious cameo necklace in its satin case clasped in her slender hands. Hardly has she sunk into slumber than a low whistle outside the house arouses Anni. She goes to the window. A few words from her master and Anni takes into her delicate jaws, without awakening the sleeper, the satin case.

Then Anni jumps out of the window, takes the box to her master waiting nearby on Fifth avenue, and he, having put the cameos in his pocket, throws the case into the gutter. It happens that Kid Joseph is nearby and he gets a glimpse of this man, but only a glimpse. In every outward sign it is Howard Dunbar, the Man of Mystery, and as Kid Joseph is hostile to Dunbar his hostility intensifies his certainty, that it is Dunbar.

You can see the complications coming. Well, they come. But we are not going to spoil the excitement of your seeing the story unfolded by telling it to you now.

"IZZY GETS THE WRONG BOTTLE" (August 19).—Izzy goes fishing and catches naught but a terrible cold. Going to a druggist for something to cure it, the druggist's clerk, who is half asleep, gives him a large bottle of laudanum by mistake. On his way home Izzy meets a friend—tells him about the cold and his cure for it. His friend tells him not to take laudanum but to take hot whiskey instead.

This Izzy does and on his return home, takes the whiskey, throws his coat into a corner and goes to sleep soused. His coat falling, breaks the bottle of laudanum, the smell of which permeates the room. The druggist discovers his clerk's mistake, rushes with the doctor and a stomach pump to Izzy's home, finds (as they believe from the odor) that he has apparently been killed by the laudanum and pump him out only to find that he hadn't taken it after all.

THANHOUSER.

"THE GUIDING HAND" (Two Parts—August 4).—James Stevens, a wealthy manufacturer, has a frivolous wife and a son who has drifted into bad habits. Mrs. Stevens sells her jewels to pay his gambling debts, substituting paste stones in their place. Later, when John is caught by his father in the act of robbing the family safe, the whole wretched situation is laid bare. Stevens is on the point of leaving his wife and son forever. But Mignon, his blind niece, who lives in the household, dissuades him. She proves the guiding hand which leads the family back to self-respect and happiness.

"STRONGER THAN DEATH" (Two Parts—August 11).—Robert Gray, while away on a vacation, falls in love with Mignon Brett, a village girl. Recalled home by a telegram from his father, he puts a ring on her hand, and hurries to town. Robert finds his father on the brink of financial ruin and his mother's health rapidly failing. There is just one way out. William Stewart, a social climber of fabulous wealth, has offered to save Gray, the elder, provided a marriage can be arrnged between his daughter, Alicia, and Robert.

When the young man realizes that failure will mean his mother's death, he reluctantly consents. After that he is haunted by the spirit of Mignon. Deserted and alone, she has sickened and died. On the night of Robert's wedding she appears so vividly to him that he collapses and the ceremony never is completed. For a long time the young man lies in a coma. At last, his spirit goes to rejoin his dead love.

"THE TELL-TALE SCAR" (August 9).—Pietro Lapori, a young barber, loves Maria Deguida, the daughter of a prosperous merchant. He is in despair, however, as his sweetheart's father refuses his consent to their marriage until Pietro shall have five hundred dollars in cash.

One day a detective shows him a circular, offering a big reward for the capture of a noted crook. In the picture on the circular a scar disfigures the criminal's face. A few days later the barber shaves a man who bears the counterpart of the scar, until now concealed by a beard. He shadows his customer, but is discovered. With great difficulty he succeeds in overpowering the crook, and is rescued just in time by the police. Pietro receives the reward and marries the girl.

"IN PERIL'S PATH" (August 14).—Mrs. Jones has been postmistress of Rosedale ever since her husband's death. Everybody seems to be satisfied except Jim Hankins, the local political leader, who tries to convince the villagers that a man should have the position, and that no one is better fitted to be postmaster than himself. A close election proves Hankin's opportunity, and it is voted that he shall succeed the widow.

Mrs. Jones is inconsolable, for she has three children dependent upon her. One night, Hankins is returning home from a spree, when he falls upon the railroad track. Only the quick wit of Leland Jones, the ten-year-old son of the ex-postmistress, saves him from being run over. And it transpires that even an unscrupulous politician may have a conscience.

AMERICAN.

"FALSE GODS" (Two Parts—August 17).—The husband enters the road to ruin when he grows ashamed of the wife of his youth and his friend. Through his wife and friend he is lifted into fabulous fortune, but he, when he is drunk with the power of money, forgets this.

As the years pass his money buys a senatorship for him. He goes to Washington without his wife, and in the bewildering smiles of a brilliant widow becomes dazzled with ambition and resolves to divorce the partner of his youth. He is influenced by the widow to put through a nefarious bill. She and her pal receive money for this. His constituents slight him for this work, and, after he has made the woman of the world his wife, they are both snubbed by the society he has coveted. But this is not the end of the ruin. The woman sells him out on the exchange and deserts him with the man who has helped her to ruin him. Mary, his divorced wife, and Tom, the old friend, hasten to him in his hour of need but they arrive too late.

"THEIR WORLDLY GOODS" (August 19).—Being a husband was a new experience to Frank Mason, and, as his thoughts were intense upon his business, the fact that his young wife may need a new gown or two never entered his mind. And Betty's thoughts were of gowns and society. So when time came for the Vonburg party, Betty found herself with only the same old gown. The evening of the party, she stood before her husband, gathered courage, and said: "Frank, won't you buy me a new gown sometime?" Frank's answer was a caress as he chided her for her foolishness, and thought she looked grand and sweet just the way she was. So her friends were right, she wore the same old gown.

"Frank is neglecting me; he doesn't care how I look," was the unjust suspicion that transformed Betty. She remembered the words of the wedding ceremony: "With all my worldly goods I thee endow." It was a different wife, the next morning, that went to the wall safe and deliberately took part of the money her husband placed there. But a loud knock at the back sounded. Frightened, she took the money with her, answered the knock. A tramp! No, she had nothing for him—but he spied the money and sprang after her. Through the rooms they went, she barring door after door behind her. Nor did she have time to telephone for aid—but the telephone operator heard and summoned help. Betty hid in the clothes closet, clutching the money, hiding her face in the gown—the same old gown.

ANNOUNCEMENT

Some time ago, under unusual circumstances, we were able to make very favorable contracts for machine parts and have been selling same at exceedingly low prices.

Circumstances have since changed, our contracts have expired, and much to our regret, we now find it impossible to renew same.

Consequently, we beg to announce that all discounts are hereby withdrawn, and in future orders for machine parts, carbons, condensers, tickets and other supplies will be filled only at REGULAR LIST PRICES.

We sincerely trust, however, that our many friends will appreciate our efforts in their behalf and continue to favor us with their patronage.

With thanks in advance and with assurances that all orders will receive immediate and careful attention and be most sincerely appreciated, we remain,

Yours truly,

tramp when Frank arrived. His money was gone—his wife gone. But when he found Betty he found his money. "What a little heroine you are for saving the money!" he said. But Betty confessed all and Frank saw the thoughtless error of his ways. His worldly goods became their worldly goods and there began a home life without restraint, a life full of love.

PRINCESS.

"THE TARGET OF DESTINY" (July 31).—Muriel Blair, a simple country girl, falls in love with Boyd Fleming, whose wealthy parents have a summer home near the village. Boyd proposes, but knowing that his family do not consider her a good match for their son, she refuses to marry him. Boyd is practicing one day on an improvised rifle range, when his little sister, unnoticed by him, climbs up behind the target. Muriel runs to the child's rescue. She saves Toosie, but is herself wounded. Mr. and Mrs. Fleming are then completely won over, and Muriel and Boyd are married.

"HER DUTY" (August 7).—Cecil Waters is in love with Walter Dillon, the head clerk in the office. Florence Mills, however, the daughter of her employer, is infatuated with Dillon, and when expenses are cut down and part of the force laid off, Cecil finds herself heading the blue list. Florence knows that Cecil has an invalid mother, whom only country air and luxuries can save. She goes to the girl, offering all this—if she will surrender Dillon. At first defiant, Cecil at last succumbs. "To him who hath shall be given——"

DOMINO.

"A ROMANCE OF THE SAWDUST RING" (Two Parts—August 13).—Jim Flint, the ringmaster in Cody's circus, in order to get rid of Jack Dorn, his rival for the love of Polly Wells, a bareback rider, manages to have Dorn jailed on a false charge. Soon after, while intoxicated, he insults Polly, and is discharged by the owner of the show. In revenge, Flint looses the animals, and Polly is pursued by a lion to an old barn, where she climbs up onto a horse stall out of the frantic beast's reach.

Dorn, meanwhile, has made his getaway, and is in hiding in the same barn. He comes to Polly's rescue. With no weapon save a pitchfork, he saves her life and disables the lion. Flint, escaping across country, stumbles into a hole, where he is found and fatally wounded by one of the wild beasts which his own fury has loosed.

BRONCHO.

"THE ROBBERY AT PINE RIVER" (Two Parts—August 19).—Bill Hicks, a trapper, robs the Sawyer Lumber Company of $5,000, by digging a tunnel into the building through the cellar. Sergeant Tom Allen chases him far into the Northern woods, and Hicks, realizing that he cannot escape, seeking to hide the tell-tale bullet wound in his right hand, thrusts it into a heavy steel trap, mutilating it. His sacrifice proves useless, however, as Allen already has finger prints of his left hand. Hicks is taken back to the scene of the robbery where he confesses. A young trapper who has been arrested on suspicion is freed, and the episode concludes with his marriage to Alice Graham.

KAY-BEE.

"THE STIGMA; OR THE BRAND OF SHAME" (Two Parts—August 14).—John Field, a young physician, is so absorbed in his work that he neglects his wife, Aubrey. She meets an actor, Philip Lane, who falls desperately in love with her. In her loneliness, she yields to his entreaties and receives him secretly. One evening the doctor returns home unexpectedly and finds Lane in the house. He is so enraged that he turns both the actor and his wife out of doors, and later, shattered by his terrible experience, disposes of his practice and goes to the Klondike.

Aubrey and Philip join a theatrical company booked for Alaska. On a long tramp between towns, Philip is overcome by the cold. Aubrey, rushing to the nearest cabin for help, comes face to face with her husband. Dr. Field hurries back with her to Philip, but it is too late. The past is forgiven, and they are reconciled.

BEAUTY.

"SUSANNA'S NEW SUIT" (August 14).—Susanna has a habit of buying articles on credit. Her husband objects to this, and one day when a suit arrives at the house C. O. D., he refuses to pay the bill. Susanna is highly indignant and threatens to go to her mother in a distant city. Van Dusen, her husband, calls the bluff, and dares her to go, whereupon Susanna angrily packs her suit-case and demands the price of a railroad ticket. To test her nerve, Van Dusen gives her the money. To his surprise, Susanna accepts it and rushes off to the depot. While waiting in line at the ticket office, she happens to glance over a paper and discovers a startling bargain in suits. Counting the money her husband has given her for railroad fare, she forgets all about going home to mother, and rushes off to the sale.

Meanwhile, Van Dusen, who has repented of the quarrel, thinks Susanna has gone and is utterly miserable. Rushing to a telegraph office, he writes a message promising to buy her the suit if she will return home immediately upon her arrival. He changes his mind, however, and stubbornly tears up the message. Meanwhile, at the sale, Susanna lays her purse down to try on a suit—and a thief steals it. About the same time, Van Dusen passes a newspaper office and discovers a crowd gathered about the bulletin board. Idly curious, he pushes his way to the front and nearly collapses. The train that Susanna was supposed to have taken to the home of her mother has been totally wrecked. Horrified at the thought that his wife has been killed, Van Dusen blames himself for the whole affair and rushes home in a state of complete madness. While his friends are trying to keep him from blowing his brains out, Susanna arrives on the scene lamenting the loss of her purse. Thunderstruck to discover that she is still alive, Van Dusen seizes her in his arms, and upon learning the facts, promises to buy her suits enough to last for a lifetime.

"AMBUSHED" (ESSANAY) (Three Parts—August 22).—Young Frank Mitchell, who terms himself a modern man of law, is summoned to draw up the will of Lady Darnley, who wishes to leave her entire estate to her favorite niece, Mable, and nothing to Bothwell, her nephew, except in the event of Mable's death, when he would inherit everything. Bothwell learns of the contents of the will and straightway plots to get Mable out of the way. He secures the assistance of Smith, a daring criminal, and the two take Mable by force to a deserted house, stiuated near a lake, just outside the city. Young Mitchell by accident hears of Mable's plight, and plans to rescue her. He makes his way to the deserted house and overhears a plot to kill the heiress. The criminals finally set fire to the house and the young lawyer rescues Mable. They find a rowboat and attempt to make their way to an island. Mable sleeps in the hut all night while Mitchell keeps guard outside the door. The hero and heroine are pursued by the criminal nephew and his aids, but are outwitted by the young lawyer. Detectives who have obtained a clew to the missing heiress, with the assistance of Mitchell, finally round up the gang in the young lawyer's office. Mitchell and Mable then discover they love each other and the drama comes to a happy conclusion.

GAUMONT.

"THE CURSE OF THE SCARABEE RUBY" (Three Parts).—Hundreds of years ago the daughters of the High Priest Yuma were appointed as guardians of the sacred Scarabee Ruby, which hung around the neck of their god. One of the daughters aided her lover to steal the sacred jewel, and her sister, trying to prevent the theft, was mortally wounded and was discovered dying at the feet of the god by her father, who in his grief and rage pronounced a terrible curse upon the sacred jewel, decreeing that into the body of the possessor should enter two different spirits, those of purity and evil, which should always be at war.

Peter Sylvester, a rising young doctor, calls for his fiancee, Mona Dorsay, and the young couple start off on a shopping expedition. Noticing a curious jewel in a curiosity shop, Mona takes a great fancy to the trinket, and Peter buys the Scarabee Ruby and presents it to Mona. That night, after retiring to her room, Mona is disturbed by the evil spirit. A terrible change comes over the young girl's face, and catching up a cloak, she goes forth into the night towards another existence, returning at the break of day. She is awakened long after her usual time by her mother, who is astonished that she had slept so long; the evil spirit has fled and Mona is once again her natural self. Quite unconscious of the night's happenings, she apologizes for her late appearance. Some nights later Mona, led by the evil spirit, becomes a member of a notorious gang of thieves, and her beauty proves an excellent snare for wealthy foreigners. Dancing one night in a hall which she frequents, she is seen by Peter, who is astounded by what he thinks a wonderful resemblance. His suspicions are dispelled next morning by Mona's fresh and charming appearance. However, gazing at her photograph later in the evening, Peter's doubts return as he fancies he sees the picture change to that of the dancing girl. That night, owing to Mona's influence Mr. Phillips, a wealthy traveler, invites the gang to supper; the police are, however, on their track, and one of the gang is a spy. Peter comes to the same restaurant, and is now certain that this is really Mona, and, despite her denials, makes an attempt to rescue her. A serious fight ensues, and in the melee Mona escapes and is driven away in a taxi before Peter can prevent her. Next morning Mona and her mother are surprised that Peter does not pay his usual visit, and send their servant to inquire. Hearing that he has been injured in an accident, the two ladies go to call upon him, and, again bewildered by Mona's apparent innocence, he keeps the doings of the night a secret and explains that his wounds are due to a motor accident. Acting on the spy's information, a plan is formed by the police to arrest the notorious gang, and that night, a raid is made on a flat. Mona, who has joined them as usual, escapes although she has been slightly wounded in the neck, and a journalist, who is among the party, succeeds in getting a flashlight photograph of her. Next morning a full report of the raid appears in the newspapers, accompanied by the photograph of Mona, and both Peter and his father are again convinced that their suspicions are correct. Mona, on waking discovers the wound on her neck, which puzzles her greatly. When shown the newspapers, she is at first amused by the resemblance to herself, but when reading of the fugitive's wound, which appears to tally with her own, she becomes disturbed and vaguely alarmed. Believing this to be a case of somnambulism, Peter and his father decide to watch her, and take up their positions outside her room. When she attempts to leave to go forth on her nocturnal wanderings, she is prevented, and becoming hysterical, faints, and Peter's father, then notices the inscription on her necklet, which reads: "Unless it shall become dust, the Scarabee Ruby will always divide the body of the wearer in which two different and opposing spirits shall manifest themselves." Now the mystery becomes clear, and Peter and his father carefully destroy the jewel, and Mona's mind is set at rest by a report in the newspapers, which announces that the girl whose photograph appeared the day before has been arrested. This has been inserted by Peter, and believing that she has lost her Scarabee Ruby, Mona is made quite happy by the presentation of a prettier pendant by her lover.

ECLECTIC.

ALL LOVE EXCELLING (Three Parts—August).—Lord Edward Litchfield is in love with Beth, a beautiful American girl of modest parentage. Lord Edward's father goes to Beth and tells her that should Edward marry her it will spoil his whole career and at the same time be a great shock to his parents. Beth bows to his will and on the next visit to her tells Lord Edward that her love for him is dead. He pleads in vain and at last goes away broken hearted. He does not see Beth again for several years and in the meantime has become engaged to Mildred Sperry, a young lady of whom his father and mother both approve.

Beth hears of his approaching marriage and writes to him asking for the return of her letters. He takes them to her in person. Then his old love awakens and he tries to persuade her to take him back. She refuses. In the course of her life she meets the Duc de St. Claire, a Parisian nobleman, who is much taken with her charms. This nobleman asks for her hand, but she cannot forget Lord Edward. Lord Edward marries Mildred and has a son who grows up into a fine, handsome boy. Owing to the death of the Duke's brother he adopts his niece, Valerie. Fate throws Lord Edward and his wife and Beth and the Duke together at a ball in Washington. Lord Edward renews his acquaintance with Beth, but is told by her that he should be true to his wife and he, in shame, leaves her. After he leaves, the Duke sees her, and renews his suit. He gets no encouragement and in anger tells Lord Edward's wife that her husband is still in love with Beth. Mildred is very much alarmed, but is reassured by Beth, who has overheard the conversation. The Duke passes out of her life then for about fifteen years. In the meantime, Lord Edward's son has grown up and is sent to Paris to complete his education. There he meets the niece of the Duc de St. Claire. They find a mutual attraction and are much together. The Crimean War breaks out and the Duke goes with his regiment to the war. Beth has become a Sister of Mercy and is in one of the hospital tents. Valerie writes her uncle, the Duke, telling him of young Lord Edward. The Duke, angered because he thinks he might have won Beth had it not been for Lord Edward, refuses his permission for any further acquaintance. The boy, nearly heartbroken upon hearing this, in a desperate mood enlists for war. He is seriously wounded in battle and on being taken to the hospital the letter written by the Duke to his niece is found on him. This reveals his identity to Beth. She goes to the Duke and adds her plea to that of the young lovers. The Duke consents. He recognizes the Sister of Mercy as his former acquaintance and renews his suit, only to be told that for her there is no future except in the work that she has sworn to carry out.

THE SIREN (Six Parts—August).—Fernande, the daughter of poor parents, is very much dissatisfied with her lot in life and wants to get out where she can have some pleasure. She is a great flirt and has several men on the string. When the doctor comes to the house she works her wiles on him to such an extent that he asks for her hand in marriage. She accepts him but in her mind has no intention of giving up her other sweethearts. After her marriage she continues to meet them with the result that he discovers her unfaithfulness. He looks in her private correspondence and finds proof that she has been utterly unfaithful. When he taxes her with it she does not deny it but tells him that she intends to continue the same way. He in a rage strikes her. Driven nearly insane he wanders round all night and on his return finds that she has gone away. He loses all trace of her and goes to a foreign country to try to forget her. In the meantime she goes to Paris, where she sets up a little court of her own. Her admirers are many, among them Count Adolphe. He is so much taken with her charms that he decides to marry her. He writes to his grandfather telling him of his decision. Then he goes to Fernande with his proposal. She is rather taken aback as she had not intended to let him get that far in the toils. To avoid his attentions she goes to a small town in Britanny where she finds life too slow for her temperament. Being one of that kind of women who must have an admirer she flirts with a young fisherman. The fisherman, Pierre, is however built of different stuff than the men she has met in Paris and will not be satisfied to merely admire her from a distance. In spite of his rough manners, or probably because of them and his immense size, he exerts a charm on Fernande that makes her lose her cool, calculating manner. She allows him to come to her home. Pierre's mother has suspected for some time that all is not well with him and follows to learn what is the cause of his desertion of his own wife. Through the good offices of an old friend she learns that Pierre is spending nearly all of his time at the home of Fernande. Going to the doctor she asks him to do what he can to get Pierre out of the clutches of the woman who is wrecking both their lives. The doctor goes to the villa and on entering finds that not only has Fernande been playing with Pierre, but that she has at the house Count Adolphe, who has followed her from Paris. He also is astounded to find the woman in the case is Fernande—his own wife who had left his house the night he had struck her. He had no idea that he had located in the same town that she had chosen for her home. He upbraids her but is met with a penitent air and an exhibition of those same charms that made him love her so long before. He falls a victim a second time only to be laughed at and told that he is an old fool. Enraged he tells Pierre and the count who she really is. Pierre, overcome, falls in a faint striking his head and badly hurting himself. He is taken home and orders are given that he is to be kept absolutely quiet if he is to recover. Fernande decides to see him and goes to his home. She is told that it is impossible to see him, but insists. Then Pierre's mother takes a hand and the Siren meets one on whom she cannot work her charms. She is forced to admit defeat and a career of wanton despoliation ends.

PICTURE PLAYHOUSE FILM CO., INC.

"THE OATH OF A VIKING".—The scene of this play opens with the temporary camp of the Viking king of Norseland on a Summer trip off the coast of England. While the men are away from camp fishing, a wandering stranger from the North happens upon Lydia, the king's daughter, asleep, and is desperately smitten with her unusual beauty. Fearing his reception upon the return of the men, he steals off to view the camp from a neighboring cliff top. Upon the return of the men he discovers that Lydia is interested in one of the men of the party, Nordo, and seizes an opportunity while the camp is about to sit down to a feast presents himself, and asks a kindly reception. The king receives him as a guest.

In the dead of night, while the camp is asleep, he attempts to steal into the cave which shelters Lydia, but is frustrated by the ever-watchful Nordo, who, crazed with rage at this attempted desecration of his sweetheart's resting place, is about to stab him when Lydia reminds him of the laws of hospitality. Olaf at the first opportunity proposes marriage to Lydia, and demands her hand from the king, the king disdainfully spurns his offer, and Olaf challenges, according to the ancient Norse law, Lydia's champion to fight for her hand. Lydia chooses her favorite, Nordo. A bloody duel is immediately fought, and Nordo conquers. Olaf is nursed back to health by the beautiful Lydia, and again protests his love.

One day a messenger arrives from Voldor, the father of Olaf, demanding his return alive, to expiate his unpardonable offence against the god Odin. Olaf makes good his escape from the camp, and the king vows that if Olaf is not captured alive, he will sacrifice his daughter to the sea. Nordo starts out to find Olaf. Olaf from a safe hiding place has overheard the king's vow, and plans a desperate revenge. He allows Nordo to see him, and when pursued feigns an injury. He grapples with Nordo, but by a mischance Nordo, in the struggle throws him over the cliff. Nordo returns to the camp broken-hearted with the sad news. The king fulfills his vow, but Nordo, unknown to the rest, dives from the foot of the cliff and raises the maiden from the bottom of the sea.

Olaf was only stunned by his fall from the cliff, and returns to the sad-hearted king, knowing that his revenge has been accomplished. Nordo sees Olaf alive and under the protection of Lydias' father, and hastens back to her with the joyful news that she can rejoin her family. The king receives his daughter back from the grave, and blesses them both.

"THE DEVIL'S FIDDLER" (Four Parts—August).—Anatol, an artist, takes for his model a very pretty dancing girl, whose name is Juana, an orphan. During the weeks that she is sitting for Anatol, her life is a happy one. One day when Anatol is entertaining some friends, a gipsy caravan arrives outside the house of the artist. Then the most wonderful music is heard from a violin player. Juana, Anatol and his friends on going outside see a deformed figure standing on the steps of the caravan playing a fiddle. Anatol's artistic nature is at once aroused, and he invites the fiddler into his house. Scaramourse, for that is the fiddler's name, begins to play, and Juana, carried away by the throbbing strains, commences to dance, and she dances as she has never danced before.

Nothing must do but that Anatol must paint the pair, and then for several days Juana and the fiddler Scaramourse are constantly together. Ugly and deformed as he is, Juana cannot resist the fascination of Scaramourse, and he persuades her to fly with him, taking the opportunity whilst the artist is out. Upon returning Anatol finds a note from Juana asking him to forgive her and never to look for her.

Six months later in Paris, Anatol, who had been living with a friend, is informed that the most wonderful dancer is appearing at "The Gamblers' Club." Anatol and his friend adjourn there at once.

In the meantime Juana suffers under the terrible jealousy of Scaramourse, the latter becoming acquainted with Baron Lofort, who persuades the fiddler to play at the tables, the stake being Juana. Scaramourse is financed by Lofort to the extent of 500 pounds, and the Baron informs him that when that is lost he will take Juana.

Anatol and his friend, having watched Juana dance at the club, follow her back to her rooms, and Anatol begs Juana to come back to him, but an unknown compulsion forces Juana not to leave Scaramourse as Anatol wishes. At this juncture Scaramourse returns, and seeing the artist he flies into a terrible frenzy and leaps at the artist's throat. Anatol flings the deformed wretch from him with such a force that he is seriously injured. Taking advantage of the opportunity, the artist seizes Juana, and together with his friend they return to his house. The fascinating spell seems to be over, but the terrible vengeance of the fiddler is to come. Dragging himself painfully along he at last reaches the window where Juana is sitting, and then commences to play.

The music once more throbs at the nature of Juana, and she commences to dance. Wilder and wilder the music rises until it reaches a climax. Juana is whirling round in a wild dance until suddenly as the music fades gradually away the dancing girl sinks to the ground dead. His vengeance completed, Scaramourse, with the pale rays of the moon on his face, gazes with intense hatred upon his victim.

Anatol, returning to the room, sees the dead body of the poor dancing girl whom he befriended and loved, and falls prostrate across her body.

"THE EVIL EYE" (Three Parts).—Bosco (the villain) is masquerading as Count Dubois, and has succeeded in becoming engaged to Janette, the daughter of a wealthy banker named Benson. Bosco has formerly gained a precarious living as a hypnotist under the name of Dr. Satan, and as the subject of his hypnotic experiments has made use of Kitty Drew—a weak-willed, but passionate woman who still lives with him. The engagement of Bosco as Count Dubois, to Janette Benson, is the old story of the girl who must sacrifice herself and all her finer instincts in order to marry a title, for Janette is in love with and loved by Jack Varley, her father's confidential clerk.

When Kitty Drew came to hear of Bosco's proposed marriage with Janette, all her woman's pride rose in arms; but under the spell of these magnetic eyes rebellion gave place to submission, and she duly consented to appear at the engagement festivities as Bosco's sister. During a relaxation of the power exercised over her by Bosco she managed to gasp out a few warning sentences to Janette, but the return of the arch villain and the consequent restoration of his power over her prevented any very important statements being made. Later in the evening Bosco succeeded in obtaining a private chat with Jack Varley—he offered him a drugged cigar, and during the momentary insensibility induced thereby extracted the key of the banker's safe. Unknown to Bosco his action is observed by Kitty, who later on endeavors to report what she has seen to Captain Castillac—an old friend of both the Benson and the Varley families. Again Bosco arrives on the scene in the nick of time and prevents any disclosure. During the day Maurice Benson, the banker's son, has been worrying Jack to lend him no less a sum than 3,000 pounds, threatening all kinds of things if the money is not forthcoming. Moreover Captain Castillac has deposited with Jack during the afternoon the sum of 4,000 pounds which at the time these events are happening is reposing in the safe in Jack's room at the bank. Disturbed by vague fears Varley visits his office that evening to make sure that everything is in order. After a careful search around, having satisfied himself that all is quite safe, he leaves, with a troubled good-night to the watchman. Soon after Bosco enters. A chloroformed handkerchief ensures him from any interference from the watchman. With Varley's key the safe is soon opened and rifled. A footstep is heard. Bosco hastily conceals himself behind a curtain. It is the banker himself. A fierce struggle ensues. The banker is left dead on the floor and the murderer goes out quietly. At the police enquiry following the murder, circumstantial evidence is all against Jack Varley. His key of the safe is found on the floor by the detectives, and his visit to the office the previous night is told by the watchman. Jack Varley's position is a terrible one; he refuses to make any defense, believing that the guilty person is the banker's own son—his sweetheart's brother, who has been so wildly importuning him for money during the previous few days. Determined that Janette Benson shall not suffer through her brother, Jack destroys what would have been strong evidence against the banker's son in the shape of several letters asking for money, and threatening the direct calamities if same is not forthcoming. Things look black now for Jack, but he has at least a few staunch friends. His blind mother, his sister and his friend Captain Castillac, never lost faith in him, nor did his sweetheart, Janette. At the trial—mainly owing to Bosco's evidence—Jack is sentenced to twenty years.

Captain Castillac feels that it is his duty to prove Jack's innocence. Disturbing recollections come to him of his having met Bosco at some earlier period in his life, but they will not materialize into definite form for some time. Finally all the previous circumstances come back to him and the captain recalls that earlier meeting with Bosco when as a sailor in a foreign cafe he had seen him—then known as Dr. Satan, performing various experiments in hypnotism with the woman Kitty as his subject. He strongly suspects that Bosco is the real culprit, but the difficulty is to obtain tangible proof and he decides to pay a visit to Bosco's house with the idea of getting Kitty to speak; but his scheme is brought to naught by the premature return of Bosco.

A few days later Kitty, who is thoroughly tired of her life as the dupe of the adventurer, attempts to escape; she gets as far as the Captain's residence, and has just rung the bell when Bosco—who has set forth in search of her—drives up, overpowers her, and drives away with her. But the summons of the bell has been heard by the Captain's faithful negro servant, who opens the gate just as the car drives away, and suspecting that something is wrong he jumps on behind. Bosco decides that it is time to rid himself of an accomplice who is likely to cause considerable trouble. On the way back a river bridge suggests the way out, and ascertaining that there are no onlookers, he stops the car and places the girl in a hypnotic trance—takes her in his arms and leans over the bridge. The next moment Kitty Drew is drowning in the waters below. Bosco jumps into the car and at once drives off. He reckoned without the Captain's negro, however, who, hiding behind the car, saw everything that happened and without waiting to consider the danger jumps on to the parapet of the bridge and dives from that dizzy height to the rescue. His heroism is rewarded, and very soon after Kitty is comfortably esconsced in the Captain's residence.

Her evidence is sufficient to clear Jack Varley and to convict the adventurer. The unmasking of Bosco is not arrived at without much trouble for even when he has been placed under arrest and is about to be handcuffed, he makes a bold bid for freedom and rushes out of the Captain's house. The negro—who has been expecting something of the kind—gives chase, and eventually after much excitement and many rough and tumble struggles Bosco is safely put into custody.

The story closes with the happy re-union of Jack and Janette.

"THE DARE DEVIL DETECTIVE" (Four Parts).—Count Landmann is engaged to be married to Hilda Ragnald, a famous dancer, and he writes to tell Detective Hayes of his engagement, and mentions at the same time that various valuable works of art have lately been disappearing from his house. He wants Hayes to help him solve the mystery.

On the evening of the reception given by Count Landmann to celebrate his engagement, Hayes arrives, and is introduced as a relative. He thinks he recognizes Hilda's brother, and his suspicions are very shortly confirmed. Harry Ragnald is a swindler, well known to the police, but so far uncaught by them. Count Landmann allows his fiancee to wear a string of pearls, a priceless family heirloom, on the night of the reception, but tells her that it is usually kept in the bank and insured for 100,000 pounds.

Hilda, in league with her brother, tries to steal the pearls, but they discover that Hayes is a detective and not a relative, and fearing detection they bide their time.

To try and get rid of Hayes, Hilda complains to her fiancee of his conduct. She asserts that he has been making love to her and has tried to kiss her. Count Landmann is greatly incensed, and tells Hayes that he engaged him to protect his property and not to make love to his future wife. Hayes is indignant at this insult, but swallowing his pride he determines to watch Harry Ragnald closer than ever.

The bank officials come to fetch the string of pearls to take them back to safe custody. Harry Ragnald follows them to the station and jumps into their compartment as the train leaves the platform, but Hayes, disguised as a porter, is on his track. Ragnald manages to chloroform the officials and steal the bag from them containing the pearls. An exciting scene follows. Hayes chases Ragnald over the roof of the train. Ragnald throws away the bag, and Hayes jumps off the train as it rushes long and finds that he has risked his life for nothing. Ragnald has cheated him, for the bag is empty.

Suddenly Hayes remembers a message he once happened to see from Ragnald, saying there would be a letter waiting at the post office, "The Three Signs at the Cross Roads." Disguised, he calls for the letter, and after reading it he returns it to be called for later by Ragnald's accomplice. Without loss of time he dashes off in a motor to the cross roads, the place appointed in the letter for the meeting. Disguised as an old hag he awaits the swindlers' arrival. He follows them to H——, and disguised as a "Boots" he makes further discoveries. Ragnald recognizes him and again puts him on a wrong scent.

Hayes traces Ragnald and Hilda to Rosenweig's house, where they are trying to dispose of the pearls. On the pretext of selling him a piece of jewelry, he manages to see the pearls in Rosenweig's safe.

Notwithstanding the injustice Count Landmann has done him, Hayes acquaints him with his discovery, and that evening they arrange to meet outside Rosenweig's house. Forcing their way, they catch Rosenweig and the Ragnalds discussing how to dispose of the pearls. The police arrest them, and the pearls are returned to their rightful owner. Count Landmann is overcome with gratitude to Hayes for having saved him from taking a step which would have ruined his whole life. He begs him to forgive him for ever having doubted him. Hayes, delighted at the success of his efforts, willingly forgives him, and they end up as good friends.

THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY.

Syndicate Film Corp. (First Episode—2 Reels—June 22).—The first reel of episode one shows Stanley Hargreaves, father of Florence Gray, stealing up from his carriage to the entrance of the Susan Farlow Select School for Girls. In his arms he cradles his baby daughter. While his coachman awaits at the carriage entrance to the school grounds, Hargreaves makes his way across the lawn and terraces to the veranda of the institution.

Tenderly he wraps up the child and puts it down in a spot sheltered from the wind. Cautiously he crouches up to a window of the office, where the matron of the school sits attending to her correspondence. A sharp rap brings Susan Farlow to the window. Hargreaves hurriedly steals back to his carriage and drives off.

Puzzled by the tap on the pane Miss Farlow swings open the doors. Before her on the threshold lies a baby, wrapped in garments of expensive texture. Pinned to the child's silken outer wraps is an envelope and inside the letter a note and a gold bracelet.

"The name of this child is Florence Gray," the note reads. "Take care of her and educate her. I shall provide liberally for her. The other half of the enclosed bracelet will identify me when I send for her."

Seventeen years pass. Florence Gray has become a young woman and one of the most popular girls in the Farlow school. Throughout her girlhood she has never wanted for anything and from time to time liberal remittances and presents reach her from her parent.

The scene changes to the home of Stanley Hargreaves, father of Florence Gray. Hargreaves, when a young man, had joined the Black Hundred. This was an organization of Russian millionaires. Circumstances made him an exile from Russia. Branded as a traitor by his fellows, the young millionaire knew that a price had been set upon his head. The passing of years had changed his appearance, however, and now, nearly twenty-five years after his departure from Europe, he hopes that the beard and the moustache he has grown, together with the changes which time has marked upon his features, have altered him beyond recognition.

Feeling assured that he will not be remembered if he returns to his old haunts, Hargreaves determines to claim his daughter, dispose of his estate and servants, liquidate his holdings, and return to Russia. He sends a note to the Farlow school demanding the return of Florence Gray, settles his daughter's bills and then, to celebrate his departure, enters one of the most fashionable of New York's restaurants.

He is recognized, as he enters, by James Norton, a reporter. Hargreaves invites the reporter to dinner and introduces him to Countess Olga Petroff and her companion, Braine. Hargreaves, as he sits down to dinner with the reporter at an adjacent table, little realizes that his nearby acquaintances, Braine and Countess Olga, are watching him closely and that they recognize in him the man for whom they have been commissioned to seek the world over.

So sure are they of their identification that both hurriedly leave the restaurant for the local headquarters of the Russian secret society. There they inform resident members of the Black Hundred that they have recognized in Hargreaves a former member of their band and that the opportunity to wreak the vengeance of the Black Hundred is at hand.

A picture of Hargreaves, taken in his youth, when he was a faithful member of the society, has come into possession of the New York chapter. This picture, now carefully preserved by Countess Petroff, is handed around among the band for identification. The conspirators, their faces covered with black masks, are sitting about a long table in a secret room when the Countess and Braine tap on the door and are admitted. Two members are delegated to spy upon Hargreaves while the rest mature their plans for his downfall.

From the moment he leaves the Fifth avenue restaurant Stanley Hargreaves is a marked man. One or another of the Black Hundred shadows him constantly. They watch him as he withdraws his wealth from the safe deposit vaults of a Wall street bank; they learn through the unsuspicious servants of his preparations for a hurried departure, and they view from a distance his secret interview with Stevens on a Long Island aviation field.

The first intimation that Hargreaves receives that his identity has been discovered is a note slipped under his door by Braine. The note warns Hargreaves that the members of the Black Hundred are aware that he has withdrawn his wealth from the bank and that he plans flight. They tell him not to try to escape.

As Hargreaves, with trembling fingers, reads the note, he staggers back against the mantle in his library and there flashes before his mind's eye the picture of his introduction into the Black Hundred years before. He sees himself again a young man, clad in Russian garb, pledging himself, while he clasps hands with the aged president of the secret order, to devote his life and wealth to the promotion of the aims of the society.

The note from the enemy causes Hargreaves to make a quick change in his plans. Hastily shaving his beard and moustache he dons a rough suit and, upon ascertaining that his home is surrounded, goes to the roof of the mansion and sets off a rocket to call Stevens to his aid. The rocket is seen by the conspirators as it roars up from the roof into the darkness. They determine to break into the isolated home of the renegade member of their band. They attack the massive entrance doors of the mansion with iron bars, dealing blow after blow that echoes through the mansion.

In the distance Braine, the leader of the band, sees a balloon creeping across the sky toward the House of Mystery. Realizing that Hargreaves intends to escape in the car of the balloon the band redoubles its attack on the door of the mansion.

As the balloon sweeps across the roof of the House of Mystery Hargreaves clutches at the basket. He manages to obtain a hold just as the big bag, struck by a sudden gust of wind, leaps into the air and is carried away over the tree tops. In his struggles to get into the basket of the balloon, Hargreaves is assisted by the pilot. The millionaire finally crawls up over the edge of the wickerwork car and falls exhausted on the floor.

While the balloon drifts out over the ocean, back in the House of Mystery Hargreaves' butler does his best to cope with the members of the Black Hundred who finally manage to break into the mansion. The conspirators, upon smashing in the great front door at once run to the roof of the house just as the balloon skims away across the tree tops. Braine shoots at the big bag in an effort to puncture it. Shot after shot goes wild but finally one takes effect and the balloon is seen rapidly sinking toward the sea.

Braine runs below to tell his fellow conspirators of his successful shot. He finds that they have bound Jones, the butler, and are giving him the third degree, in an effort to make him reveal where Hargreaves has hidden his wealth. But someone has already removed all the money from the safe built into the wall of Hargreaves' library, and Jones is able only to point to the empty compartments. Far out at sea a collapsed balloon bag drifts about on the wave tops, kept afloat by the wicker work car and the few remaining feet of gas within the bag.

"THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY" (Syndicate Film Corp.—Second Episode—Two Reels—June 29).—Jones, the butler, struggles to free himself. Removing the receiver from the telephone resting on the table near his chair, with his teeth, the butler calls police headquarters. A platoon of police soon arrive and unbind him. They find the safe in the Hargreaves' home broken open and its contents scattered about. A search is begun for the conspirators. Florence Gray (Hargreaves' daughter) arrives with Miss Farlow to find her father gone. Jones, who meets her at the station, produces the other half of the bracelet which Florence carries, and gives her a letter from her father instructing her to trust implicitly in him. Florence hardly has had time to adjust herself to her new surroundings when she has two visitors. One of them is Norton, the reporter, who reveals himself as a true friend. The other is Countess Olga Petroff who, upon the pretence that she knew Florence's father, tries to ingratiate herself in the girl's confidence.

While the Countess, Norton, Florence and Miss Farlow are together, two of the conspirators, representing themselves to be Central Office detectives, force their way into the house in an effort to find Hargreaves' money for which they did not have time to search thoroughly the night before. Norton at once recognizes the detectives as impostors and calls up police headquarters. The conspirators suspect the reporter and while a desperate fight is in progress the police arrive. The two conspirators are captured and are taken away.

During the fight the Countess Petroff, seeing the struggle going against Braine, succeeds in tripping up the reporter. Norton, however, manages to pinion his man, and, although suspicious of the Countess, says nothing when the police arrive. She is allowed to depart without being molested. The conspirators, taking advantage of a street accident, in which a child is run down by an automobile, break away from the police when the vigilance of the latter is relaxed for a moment. The exciting episode in which Norton has figured cements the friendship between him and Florence and the reel closes with a pretty scene between the young people.

The Countess Olga, clever adventuress that she is, still remains unsuspected of complicity with the conspirators who are plotting the death of Florence Gray's father and the seizure of his great fortune.

"THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY" (Syndicate Film Corp.—Third Episode—Two Reels—July 6).—The Black Hundred learns, through the daily papers, that Hargreaves, after drifting 300 miles out to sea, has been picked up while swimming about the wreck of the balloon in which he escaped from the House of Mystery.

When Hargreaves lands at the dock newspapermen try to interview him but he escapes in the crowd. Norton, knowing that the conspirators believe that Hargreaves has his fortune upon his person, lays a trap for them. By judiciously tipping the watchman of the wharf where the ship which landed Hargreaves moored, Norton misleads Countess Olga into believing that Hargreaves' wealth is locked up in a box safe in the wharf office.

The Countess hurries at once to the Charity Ball where she meets Braine and tells him what she has learned. Braine collects a dozen gangsters in an East Side saloon and creeps up to the wharf office, intent upon cracking the safe and removing the treasure chest which he believes is within. Norton posts a dozen patrolmen behind barrels near the office door. The gangsters are captured while at work, but Braine, whom Norton wished most to catch, jumps into the river and swims away in the darkness.

"THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY" (Syndicate Film Corp—4th Episode—2 Reels—July 13).—Working on the theory that Florence Gray, the eighteen-year-old daughter of Stanley Hargreaves, the hunted millionaire, knows where her father's money is hidden, the Black Hundred conspirators determine to trap her in their rooms and there force her to reveal the secret she is believed to possess.

In carrying out this plan they are aided by their knowledge that Florence Gray never has seen her father, a circumstance which obviously would enable one of their number to disguise himself to impersonate Stanley Hargreaves and thus ingratiate himself into the guileless child's affections and confidence.

Braine—aptly named, for he is the intelligent, driving force behind the Black Hundred's plot to get Hargreaves' fortune—drafts a note calculated to appeal to the father-love of the simple boarding-school graduate. The conspirator's note read as follows:

"My darling daughter:

"I must see you to-night. Come to 78 Grove Street, top floor, at 8 o'clock. Confide in no one if you would not seal my death warrant.

"Your loving father."

That night Braine, unwilling to trust any of his fellow conspirators with so delicate a mission, creeps into the park surrounding the house and climbs in his stocking-feet to the roof of the veranda upon which Florence Gray's bedroom window opens. Florence, only half asleep, hears some one tampering with her window. Too terror-stricken to scream, she leaps from her bed and then to the window. Braine, his object attained, has gone. Florence picks up the envelope and tears it open. Its contents have not the ring of sincerity but Florence is too eager to clasp her father in her arms to long consider what she believes may only be her own false suspicion.

Down at the entrance to the mansion Jones, the butler, opens the door to find A. Leo Stevens, the aeronaut, with a message for him. Braine, creeping across the lawn, sees the balloonist talking with the butler, but in his hurry to escape attaches little importance to the circumstance.

Prevented by the note's caution from confiding her doubts to Miss Farlow, her companion, Florence is undecided as to what to do. Her desire to see her parent wins over her suspicions, however, and that evening a heavily veiled young woman steals out through the grounds of the Hargreaves mansion toward the address named in the note.

She finds 84 Grove street an apartment house in a secluded and unpretentious neighborhood. She makes her way from landing to landing until she reaches the door leading into the apartment on the top floor. A knock soon brings what appears to be a venerable old man to the door. Florence is undecided what to do, but as the old man bears a striking resemblance to the painting of her father the girl does not resist when he clasps her in his arms.

Something rings false and the timid girl is quick to sense the dissonance. Her suspicions are verified only too quickly. The conversation too quickly passes to the subject of Hargraves' wealth. The question convinces the girl that she has been trapped, that the man to whom she is talking is a cleverly disguised imposter. While the latter's back is turned, she stealthily tries a door behind her. It is locked. When she tries another door in the room the stranger leads her away from it with a benevolent smile. While he had his arms about her Florence was horrified to see in the mantel mirror five faces peering through a door.

The false father leaves the room. She hears him planning with the conspirators to torture her into a confession. She sees one of the men struggling with a writhing python which is to be freed in the room with her if she does not tell them what they want to know.

The false father seizes Florence by her throat at the moment the conspirators enter with the python. Florence seizes a chair and smashes the only lamp in the room.

While the conspirators grope about, the girl quickly shuts herself in a cabinet built into the wall. The gangsters believe, when they discover her absence, that she has thrown herself from the window. But, as they peer out, a noise behind them makes them turn, only to see Florence dash through the open doorway into the hall. She locks the door behind her and flees to safety.

"THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY (Syndicate Corp., Fifth Episode—Two Reels—July 20).—Angered by the way Florence Hargreaves has slipped through their fingers just when they believed they were about to wrest from her the secret of her father's millions, Countess Olga, Braine and their band of conspirators form another plan to entrap her. Braine dictates the following newspaper personal which is inserted in a local newspaper:

Dear Florence—The hiding place is discovered. Remove to a more secure hiding place at once. S. H.

A conspirator is sent disguised as an organ grinder to spy upon the occupants of the Hargreaves mansion so that in the event the treasure is removed after the personal is read it can be traced to its new hiding place. The conspirator is accompanied by a girl dancer.

Jones, Hargreaves' butler, sees the organ grinder approach the limousine of the Countess Olga when the latter motors out of the Hargreaves grounds. Returning to the curtains, through which he can peep out upon Margaret and Miss Farlow, the butler overhears them reading the personal. Jones at once realizes that the advertisement is meant to frighten Florence, and determines to mislead the supposed organ grinder.

He watches the conspirator creep close to the mansion and climb a tree, from which he drops to the roof of the porch. Jones then goes upstairs into Florence's room and, after assuring himself that the organ grinder is on watch, slides up a picture of Sidney Hargreaves and two other panels in the wall. This action reveals a brass-bound box with the name Stanley Hargreaves upon it. The Italian hurries to Braine and tells him that he has discovered the hiding place of the treasure and that the butler is about to secrete it elsewhere.

Braine and the organ grinder follow Jones to a boat landing where they learn that he has engaged Little Marie, one of the fastest power boats on the seaboard. The conspirators also engage a speedy motor boat and set off in pursuit.

After cruising about the sound, the conspirators finally spy a launch miles off on the farther shore. Jones is digging furiously, apparently trying to bury his box before discovery, but when his boatman tells him that a launch is heading full speed toward the cove in which they have taken refuge he rushes back to the Little Marie. The speedy launch is driven quickly out of the cove into the open sound.

Then starts a desperate race between Braine and his fellow conspirator on the one hand and Jones on the other. The long black craft hired by Braine has a greater supply of gasoline, however, and at last draws near Jones' boat. Jones, seemingly making a last desperate fight for possession of the Hargreave treasure, draws a revolver and shoots a hole in the feed pipe of Braine's launch. He raises the box high in air and casts it into the sea.

Jones then quickly makes his escape and Braine's craft drifts helplessly about. The conspirators can see the treasure box resting on the bottom of the sea, but while they are peering over the edge of their launch, gasoline, seeping through the bullet hole in the feed pipe, is ignited by the sparking motor and in a few minutes the launch is aflame from stem to stern.

Driven from their boat the conspirators plunge one by one, their clothes aflame, into the sea. They have taken only a few strokes from the launch when the gasoline tank explodes and sends the launch to the bottom.

In this by-adventure Jones is merely amusing himself at the expense of the conspirators. Confident of his ability to mislead the members of the Black Hundred unassisted he does not call Norton to his aid. Back at the Hargreaves' mansion the young reporter's love affair with Florence advances by leaps and bounds, always restrained, however, by the chaperonage of Susan Farlow, Florence's instructress and mentor.

VENTILATION COOLING HEATING

Heating and cooling problem revolutionized by Typhoon System.

You keep cool in front of a desk fan and not in back; apply this common sense and blow the air into your theatre.

A 48" Typhoon Multiblade Blower has sixteen blades, an ordinary exhaust fan has six; it is the blades that do the business.

A Typhoon Tubular Air Warmer will heat and ventilate at the same time.

The low price of effective apparatus will surprise you. Catalogue "W" gives information.

JM Transite Asbestos Wood Booth and its contents

In the fire of February, 1914, which completely destroyed Poli's Theatre, Springfield, Mass., the J-M Transite Asbestos Wood Booth remained practically undamaged, although the flames raged fiercely around it and burst through the roof of the theatre.

The contents of the booth, including a new moving picture machine purchased a few days previous to the fire, remained intact.

The photograph reproduced herewith has not been retouched in any way. It shows exactly how the booth looked just after the debris cooled off.

MAKE 'EM YOURSELF SLIDES

Make them yourself. Written with pen and ink or typewriter. Three minutes to make a slide. Used for advertising slides, to announce future or feature programmes, for chorus slides when chorus slide is missing. We send four colors of gelatin. The slides look well and anyone can make them. They are handy also for announcing vaudeville acts. In fact, they may be readily used for anything you may wish to say to your audience.

For the sum of $3.50 we will send, by parcel post, prepaid and insured, the following:
24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. Address:

"How clear the pictures are!"

You've often overheard that remark—and it's as strong a commendation, brings as much business as does a favorable comment on the picture story itself.

The "clearest pictures" are on Eastman film because the product is right, chemically and physically.

It is easily identifiable by the stencil "Eastman" in the margin.

A Friendly Tip from Carl Laemmle

"The new Universal serial story, 'THE TREY O' HEARTS,' by Louis Joseph Vance, will be the hit of the new season. You can take my word for it that it is by far the hottest, liveliest, most exciting, most interesting story ever shown in moving pictures before a discriminating public. You know that I have never given you a wrong tip, and I am not going to start now. To be sure, 'LUCILLE LOVE'' was a big money maker, but 'THE TREY O' HEARTS' will beat it to a frazzle. By making arrangements now, you are absolutely assured of a record-breaking business the day you show the picture, for a period of fifteen weeks. It will cost you a little extra money, but it is well worth it. 'A word to the wise, etc.'"

THE PHANTOSCOPE

If you would use motion pictures as an aid in salesmanship, you need THE PHANTOSCOPE. If you would use motion pictures as an aid in efficiency instruction, you need THE PHANTOSCOPE. If you would use motion pictures as an aid in education you need THE PHANTOSCOPE. If you would have a machine you carry as conveniently as a suit case, can set up in any room in just seventy seconds, and without tools other than your two hands, you need THE PHANTOSCOPE. If there's any doubt in your mind about its value to you in YOUR work, just note the great number of users of THE PHANTOSCOPE. Just as with the automobile, and as one would naturally expect, there have been striking improvements made since the first PHANTOSCOPE. And yet there are many machines which have been in almost continuous service, since the very first, and they are running smoother and sweeter than ever.

The price is $100 complete—Motor driven $125.

Buffalo Bill

The last of the great Indian fighters, Colonel Wm. F. Cody and Lieutenant General Nelson A. Miles (retired) of the United States Army, are the leading players in this most realistic film of the age.

This picture, which has been APPROVED BY THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT and made under the DIRECTION OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT, has attracted the attention of the entire world.

"THE INDIAN WARS"

As a Money-Maker this film is without an equal. The Advertising Possibilities of the picture are unlimited. It is a FIVE-REEL THRILLER THAT WILL LIVE FOREVER.

1000 INDIANS, many of whom were leaders in the original battles; 12th U. S. CAVALRY, and MANY OFFICERS now retired, again took their places in the re-enacted scenes.

Historically Correct and all scenes TAKEN ON THE EXACT LOCATION of the original battles.

(SEVEN PER WE

In answer to the demand from Universal exhibitors we have arranged to release seven fea per week instead of six, beginning about the middle of September. This means a feat day—six 2-reelers and one 3-reeler every week—which, when mixed with our splendid one and split-reel subjects makes up the ideal program.

THE PROGRAM THA

MARY FULLER RELEASES are being made under the direction of Mr. H and the supporting cast includes Mr. Ogle. All three of these popular formers are former Edison favorites. The first release, entitled "The Hea the Night Winds," will be released later. It is a Universal Special.

MARY PICKFORD RE-ISSUES are a veritable gold mine for exhibitors. T releases, made by the old Imp company when "Little Mary" first began to world-wide fame, are packing Universal houses everywhere and are thro consternation into competitors. We have a year's supply!

THE TREY O' HEARTS SERIES is packing Universal houses to capacity more! Louis Joseph Vance wrote the wonderful story. Cleo Madison George Larkin with a splendid supporting cast under the great direction of fred Lucas, are making it even more wonderful. Demand it!

TRY "LUCILLE LOVE" WEEK! Run four reels of "Lucille Love" every for a whole week! This is the new scheme that is coining huge profits for versal exhibitors. Ask the nearest Universal exchange about it. Give the story to your patrons in ONE WEEK (30 reels) and do it quickly!

R FRANCOIS VILLON SERIES written by George Bronson Howard and appearing in story form in the Century Magazine is a tremendous undertaking. We lose money on every reel of it but it is a sensational money-maker for the exhibitors. No other concern could afford to give such big value!

UBIN STARS JOIN BIG U. Always on the lookout for the best talent available we have signed up Rosemary Theby, leading lady; Harry C. Myers, director and leading man, and Brinsley Shaw, heavy, all of the Lubin company. Watch for release dates on these favorite players.

ISON STAR JOINS BIG U. And we've landed Ben Wilson of the Edison company. Every Universal exhibitor will hail this news with keen joy. It means another star of first magnitude added to the Universal's record-breaking list. Use the brains God gave you.

NG BAGGOT'S ACHIEVEMENT. King Baggot has just completed a remarkable two-reel feature in which he plays every different character in the entire cast! We don't believe it has ever been attempted for the screen before. Watch for further details of this Universal Special.

WAR EXTRA

The Eclectic

"The Cream of American and European Studios"

WAR EXTRA

THE ECLECTIC FILM COMPANY 110 West 40th Street, New York City

WAR IS ON LAND AND SEA AND IN THE MINDS OF MEN

Everybody wants to see war pictures and the Eclectic Company is able to present a number of multiple reel war features which for timeliness and for demonstrating the gruelling methods of modern European warfare cannot be excelled. They show engagements between the very nations today in battle.

THE LAST VOLUNTEER

BIG POWERS BREAK

A Timely 5-Reel War Drama, Laid at the Seat of the Present Austrian-Servian War.

Pathe made—a story of intense patriotism entwining the relations of a Crown-prince and an Innkeeper's daughter with International affairs. War follows. In the grim and realistic battle scenes, aeroplanes, artillery, and every other modern engine of destruction is employed, and the resulting carnage faithfully pictured. A girl makes a heroic rescue midst splintering bullets. Good display in 1-3-6 and 24 sheet posters.

FAITHFUL UNTO DEATH

France and Germany at War.

A pulsing story of the Franco-Prussian War in 4 parts. Vivid battle scenes which show the bitter, long-suppressed hatred between Europe's greatest rivals, and connected with the pathetic story of a woman's sacrifice to aid her nation. 1-3-6 and 24-sheet posters.

NAPOLEON

The World's Greatest Warrior Changes the Map of Europe

The meteoric career of Napoleon and his defiance to the whole world, pictured with historical accuracy and modern day interest in 5 reels. Significant scenes from the last great struggle for European supremacy which can easily be compared with the crucial happenings of today. 1- 3- and 6-sheet posters.

ECLECTIC'S 4-A-WEEK

Monday—THE PERILS OF PAULINE, every two weeks—Short subjects alternate weeks.

Tuesday—AMERICAN 1 or 2 REEL COMEDY.

Wednesday—SUPER-EXCELLENT MULTIPLE REEL PRODUCTION.

Friday—SURPASSING ATTRACTION OF SEVERAL REELS.

WAR IS HELL

Aeroplanes Battle in Clouds

A 4-part war picture in natural colors, dealing mainly with modern aerial warfare. Exploits of great daring are featured—an aeroplane duel in the clouds, the destruction of giant war balloons, and the blowing up of an old mill, all woven into an absorbing story. 1- 3- and 6-sheet posters.

ALL LOVE EXCELLING

Sisters of Mercy Work Through Crimean War

An American made drama in 3 reels. A moving story of sacrifice which culminates in the Crimean War, when France and England fought Russia. It features the humanitarian side of warfare and shows the work of the Sisters of Mercy in caring for the sick and wounded. 1- 3- and 6-sheet posters—6-sheet scene of the Battle of Inkerman.

THE PERILS of PAULINE

Pauline puts her Perils on the screen and Takes Yours Out of the Box-office.

Pauline's the leading light of the movies. Her name means a crowd. She's written about, photographed, quoted, and set to music. She's advertised in type, pictures, music and by word of mouth. She's the best known, best liked, and best pulling character in film-life—conservative statements all of them. A "Pauline" run in your theatre will look like a run on the bank, only it's a run on the paying teller—for everything is coming in and nothing going out.

There's no Lure Like a Pauline Poster—She Corners Attendance.

HOW MAX WENT AROUND THE WORLD and PICTURESQUE AUVERGNE

A split reel which combines the laugnable efforts of Max with the beautiful scenic effects in natural colors of Auvergne, that tranquil sun-bathed valley of France which in all probability is soon to be devastated by the inroads of the invading German troops.

FORCING THE FORCE

No laugh is safe from this New Hartigan Comedy

There's nothing forced about "Forcing the Force"—it's up in the Eclectic standard of humor. The only danger is to your patron's vest buttons.

throws on the screen the living pictures of the fighters and the fighting in Europe. It's head and shoulders and several years beyond the fragmentary, incomplete, unsubstantiated, hazy war bulletins, yet look at the crowds there. Think of it—you can offer box seats for the war—the PATHE NEWS posters are barriers which people in the street cannot pass. You get everybody in again and again—it's your chance—be quick. VENDETTA

FROM THE NOVEL BY MARIE CORELLI

Five Parts (5071 Feet)

Quite the Most Beautiful, Realistic and Absorbing Novel the Famous English Novelist Has Yet Written

A Man Buried as Dead, returning to consciousness in his coffin, knocking it by his struggles from its niche in the wall; thereby breaking open a casket filled with jewels; smashing his way out the tomb to his castle only to find his wife and dearest friend unfaithful to him; plotting a revenge Hellish in its execution; the killing of his faithless wife in that self-same tomb by earthquake the night of his second marriage to her—these are the essentials of a story we firmly believe unrivaled in the annals of filmed Novels. One thrill treads upon the footsteps of another. Pantomime finds its highest expression in "VENDETTA."

The settings are the most beautiful in Southern Italy—the photography as clear and brilliant as a mountain stream. In "VENDETTA" we offer all that is possible in Motion Photography.

TREASURE TROVE

By LORING M. HEWEN

Bob and Frank decide to spend their vacation at the beach. They meet Col. Fairfield's two daughters. The Colonel has too much regard for his daughters' future to think of letting either of them marry a man not able to properly support her. The boys, however, discover a paper among wreckage on the beach written in Spanish. It tells of a treasure and its location off shore. They are about to discover it when armed Cuban villains approach and threaten trouble. Then the Colonel appears and the villains flee. The boys are now rich and have won the Colonel's admiration.

Facts and Comments

A COURT of inferior jurisdiction in Philadelphia has denied an injunction against the enforcement of the Pennsylvania censorship law. The court says that the law is a proper exercise of the police power and ought to stand. We do not know whether there will be an appeal, but we earnestly hope there will be. There is a tendency in certain quarters to curry favor with censors in the expectation of special favors or leniency. Such an attitude not only shows a poor spirit, unworthy of a real American, but it is poor business policy. The censor of today may be wheedled into friendliness, but what about the censor of tomorrow? What about the great principle involved in the issue of censorship? Why should the producer of motion pictures be called upon to mollify and conciliate a censor? He is not engaged in a dubious calling, but in a strictly legitimate enterprise which is of great benefit to the whole community. He is not a pariah or leper who must be cleansed before he can be permitted to mingle with other folk.

We will never inspire fear or respect by truckling to the politicians. Weakening in the maintenance of a great principle is an invitation to the grafters to load more burdens on the industry. Let us not become disheartened because the courts show a tendency to uphold the censorship laws. Courts are not infallible. The highest court of the land, in the greatest issue it was called upon to decide, decided straight against the best public opinion, holding that the fugitive slave law was constitutional. Today this decision is part of the garbage of history. The people everywhere begin to assert the right to overrule the court whenever the great majority take a different view of the law in question. However, this may be the agitation against censorship, the parent of graft and the weapon of tyrants, will never be checked by the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in the city and county of Philadelphia. If we cannot set the law aside as unconstitutional we can work for its speedy repeal. The exhibitors of the state are working for the repeal at the present moment and the campaign will grow much hotter before election day is here. A concerted attack on the law with the slide as a most effective weapon is planned by the leaders of the Pennsylvania exhibitors. It is proposed to support only such candidates as will pledge themselves to a repeal of the obnoxious measure.

IN a large city in this state a little group of film men were discussing prices and prospects when one of them made the remarkable statement that the best reel ever made was not worth more than five dollars. Another man agreed with him and called upon the Almighty to punish him if he ever paid more than a rental of five dollars a reel. These gentlemen, we say it with all due respect, belong to the cave period of film history. Perhaps they have never seen anything better than time-table releases, but this must be doubted. The day is at hand when the men with such opinions will be jolted into the consciousness of higher things. A man will come along willing and even anxious to pay more than five dollars rental for a reel, and this will be the man who has his future before him. He will draw the patronage away from the men of little faith. We are approaching a condition of affairs when films will either be worth a good deal more than five dollars a reel or a good deal less.

A film man of note with success as his credentials to be heard in council recently voiced his opinion to the writer that the next few years will bring great fortunes to the new type of exhibitor who knows how to hunt quality and how to present his pictures after he gets them. Many things will be torn up by the roots in the next few months. The man who will emerge from the confusion with a smile will be The Exhibitor With Brains. This man must be able to choose without asking others how to do it. He must know how to give individuality to his theater and to his program. Right now, and right here in New York, there are scores of theaters of good size that seem to have no head to them, apparently running themselves. The orchestra does what it pleases, the operator does what he pleases, attendants pass a sort of listless existence, and the whole place lacks the unifying, directing spirit. The modern trend of the motion picture art will sweep these places out of being before the fall is fully under way.

"First Runs"

By W. Stephen Bush.

MANY of us remember the day when the "first run" was regarded with superstitious awe. As the film was brought into the exchange by the express man a reverent silence fell upon the office force. The errand boy took the cigarette out of his mouth, clerks and bookkeepers suspended their casual conversations, exhibitors took off their hats and the owner of the exchange expanded with the pride of possession. It was heresy to question the supreme and sovereign value of a "first run." It never occurred to even the boldest of exchange men or exhibitors to inquire into the quality of a "first run." Every "first run" was simply above criticism by the very fact of its being what it was. The man who used even one "first run" qualified thereby into the upper grades of exhibitors, while the man showing an all "first run" program was regarded as a demigod. The belief in the all-conquering virtues of the "first run" was rooted deeply in the exhibiting mind. The demand for "first runs" was riotous. It was the first conviction of the average exhibitor that people cared absolutely nothing about the quality of a picture. He held that, no matter how good the Monday release of the ——— Company might be, it could not possibly cope with Tuesday's release. There were exceptions; in some parts of the country the "first run" craze never took much of a hold. Curiously enough, these parts of the country remained free from the destructive influences of competition for "first runs." They were exceptions, however, and favored by fortune.

At a time when the supply of film fell far short of the demand and when men went into the exhibiting profession with no thought for tomorrow, anxious only to "get in on the boom of a novelty," the idolatrous worship of the "first run" was scarcely to be wondered at. Even now the "first run" madness is still with us. A far larger supply, a radical change in the personnel of the exhibitors, the knowledge of improved methods of presentation, the change in the place of exhibition and many other causes have helped to localize the evil effects of the "first run" idiocy. If you, good reader, care to give a little attention to the subject you must have noticed that the real exhibitors of the new era and, indeed, mostly all showmen who give motion picture exhibitions only, have realized the folly of exalting the "first run" above the picture of quality. The men who constitute the blind army of "first run" men today are recruited from theatrical men. These men, inexperienced and inexpert, with a sublime but wholly unwarranted faith in their powers of judgment, are seeking to revive the "first run" age of motion pictures. But recently we saw, not without a lively sense of amusement, a theatre on Broadway announcing in electric pyramids and in other megaphonic methods, "First run" programs. While The Vitagraph theater and The Strand were giving selected programs and running them for not less than a full week, filling their houses at solid and substantial prices of admission, this theater trumpeted forth the "first run" and its deadly twin brother the "daily change." It did not last long. We do not want to say that the "first run" and the daily change may not be successful, but we seem safe in asserting that they cannot survive in competition with houses conducted along progressive lines and in the light of seven years' practical experience. A similar attempt to revive the "first run" tactics in destroying competition was made in a big neighboring summer resort and here too failure camped on the trail of the ancient superstition.

The best judgment of film experts is that the general public never did care half as much for the "first run" as the exhibitors seemed to believe. In the very early days, of course, in the age of the store-room and the short length film, the audience wanted new things, but who constituted the audience? The half-grown boys in the neighborhood and people who had little taste and discrimination. In those days the poor exhibitor would often blanch and tremble when one or two of the unwashed youths on the front benches in withering scorn uttered the fearful words: "I seen dat before." I surely do not blame the unwashed youths. Boys between eight and sixteen are naturally eager for something new. The dime novel of yesterday is never as welcome as the dime novel of today and tomorrow. Nobody, however, would dream of making boys the supreme arbiters of literature and place Henty above Shakespeare, Milton, Dante, Homer and other "old fogies." This is exactly what some of our early producers and exhibitors did, or at least attempted to do. I shall never forget the scorn with which a well-known director in the infant days of the industry received my mild and diffident suggestion that it might be possible to film Shakespearian plays. He never even deigned to enter into the question. He did not claim it was impossible to film such plays, but he derided the idea that people would ever go to see such films and pay an admission.

It is strange how this lack of faith in the possibilities of our art still persists in quarters where one might expect intelligence. Every time a great production is put on the market these Cassandras, small-visioned prophets of evil, are heard in grating chorus. We heard them when "Quo Vadis" flashed across the kinematographic sky like a coruscating meteor and we heard the same pessimistic song when "Cabiria" swept all records aside. "People will not pay a dollar to see motion pictures," said some, and others croaked something about the "subject being too deep" or the "films being too long." I would just like to take the doubters around to the Knickerbocker Theater on any old night, no matter how hot, and show them long lines of men and women waiting and fighting to pay real U. S. dollars for seeing motion pictures.

Quality is advancing slowly and is breaking down all the ancient barriers by which the motion pictures was kept in commercial confinement. One of the worst foes of quality has been the time table release, manufactured in response to an artificial demand. Gradually we are beginning to discover that the public is really interested in quality. Pictures are not merchandise in the sense that cheese and sausages are.

Let me say in conclusion that quality now lies within reach of every exhibitor who intends to make quality his watchword. I do not say quality lies within easy reach, for it does not. Quality has be hunted. Everywhere we are building theaters for motion pictures of high quality. Some who have been hunters of quality even in the days when quantity seemed supreme say that the supply of quality is still short of the demand. They claim it is difficult to maintain a uniformly high grade of entertainment with even but one change a week. This latter class, however, is strictly confined to the big cities. The exhibitor in the smaller towns often far away from the exchanges has perhaps the more difficult problem to solve. He cannot select a program from various sources as easily as his brother in the big city with one or two or more exchanges.

Expressions of Life

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

THE screen portrayal should tell a story with a punch in an interesting way. That is not a complete summing up, but it covers a multitude of artistic and scientific errors. A plot that holds attention comes very close to being the foundation on which the whole storied structure is to be built, but there is a good deal else besides, notably an ability to visualize a trenchant criticism of existing conditions and a wondrous gift of making an experience, however remote in time and place, seem plausible. Besides a knowledge of photodramatic construction, this requires a certain amount of audacity, for the author must convince an audience that what is going on really did happen. This plausibility saves many an awkward explanation in subtitle and puts the spectator into an indulgent mood where he is willing to overlook unavoidable shortcomings. This is all easy to the author of inborn quality, the natural story teller, but it is extremely difficult to acquire.

Even in great photodramas of no particular time and place, amid the mystical atmosphere of nowhere in particular, the born author will easily provide a steady current of narration that is reasonably possible and rarely dull, often replete with artistic charm, constituting nearly as often a play that finds a ready market. The natural-born writer of stories has an instinct for providing thought stimulus under the guise of pure entertainment, kindling the emotions, before he asks the audience to do any hard thinking. He does not exhibit human weakness for the sake of that exhibition, a thinly veiled sermon, but for purposes of contrast, thus submerging the idea of showing men what they should be or might be under conditions quite possible for society to bring about. Such an author may picture exceptional phases of life, but he does so to awaken exceptional interest. Mere expressions of life that have no meaning, the automatic movements of characters in and out of houses on their way from one place to another seriously weaken a photodrama unless they are indicated to enhance suspense at a crisis. Mere expressions of beauty when a lovely scene is handy are better, but they should be utilized only when carrying forward the story, and they should enter into it as if unsought. That naturalism in which the audience delights makes the treatment of a screen story very important, but the source of it should lie in the scenario. The author really selects the types and it is his business to let them follow their natural inclinations, their natural tendencies, once he has brought the various characters together under striking or exceptional conditions. The strong expression of life must begin at the beginning to be effective in the end.

The instinct of a natural story teller warns him against errors that must be carefully studied to be understood by those who merely feel the narrative impulse, and greatest of these errors is that of narrowing one's horizon. Life as devised by the Creator of it has an infinity of aspects, so that the only creed a born author can wear is one that can be slipped on and off for the occasion. His code is that of the story he is telling. At one moment it is a delightful romance of unconscious realism, at another it concerns a realistic social problem into which is woven the romantic destinies of a group or of an individual. He may at one moment have the power of making ordinary lives seem beautiful or interesting by dressing their commonplace in a sympathetic or imaginative way. He may at another have a graphic mastery of visualization that makes the screen glow with the turmoil of battle, or with the movement of great masses in their intense struggle for existence.

The born teller of stories may frivol in melodrama or strike an ultra-modern blow for our betterment; he may present the human narrative as a historical lesson or as a cross-section of actual existence; he may offer a solution of present social entanglements or probe the mental subtleties of men and women; his limitations are those of his genius, never of his subject matter. If that subject matter be of live interest, so much the better, but ability to handle it is what wins in the long run. The ability of directors and actors in visualizing a story has long been recognized—the ability of one who creates the stories to be visualized was an after consideration—it is just beginning to count. Those who are gifted with narrative power and knowledge of constructing stories for visualization have been accorded meagre recognition until this year, but their importance as one of the factors of success in screen production will be deeply impressed upon producers before the year has come to a close.

Those authors who are already receiving recognition have passed through a trying period, during which patience and toleration alone have enabled them to survive. Rampant directors of the old type, of the rush-order, make-it-while-you-wait kind, could not see that anything was vital to a theme, that nothing in particular was of structural necessity, that secondary characters should not be given importance through favoritism, that the injection of irrelevant details meant distraction if not destruction, that intrusion of their personal ideas blurred the development, if it did not wholly eliminate the author's intention. Such directors were told to go ahead and turn out a photodrama in a given time at a minimum of cost, and they did it, either because they had to or because it was an easy way to easy money. One result was a flood of screen inanities, another result is in store for those who produce without principle.

Inability on the part of producers to distinguish between what is transitory, the aspiring scenario of incompetence, and what is permanent and enduring, the work of an author who is in a state of development akin to that of the art itself, is behind light-hearted confidence in the plenitude of plays; so also is a desire to appropriate rather than reward superior creative talent. But the genial gentlemen who have been measuring merit with a bushel basket are beginning to look about them anxiously for something worth the large expenditure of their time and money. Having exhausted the seemingly inexhaustible, the literary and dramatic veins of expired copyright, they are now rushing madly into the acquirement of every modern work of fiction, irrespective of its suitability for screen presentation. What can be better than what has been?

Having acquired mastery of screen publication, the producer now finds himself looking about anxiously for something worth while to publish. What seemed easiest in the period of amateur scenario overflow has suddenly become difficult if not decidedly embarrassing. He formerly published because he had to visualize a story, whether or not it was a true expression of life—he had simply acquired control of a wonderful medium of conveying thought and emotion—but things are coming to such a pass that there is less and less call for his visualizations unless he has a story to tell. Will authors please send him a few powerful expressions of life at $25 per reel? Will they?

"Chip of the Flying U"

A Breezy Western Comedy in Three Reels, by Selig, with Kathlyn Williams and Tom Mix in the Leading Roles.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

NEARLY every one has read and heartily laughed over B. M. Bower's story about "Chip of the Flying U." Bower's story breathed the very atmosphere of western cowboy life, and the characters were so cleverly pen painted that most of us had them well defined in our mind's eye; now we are shown in these Selig pictures the living embodiments of the prototypes, and follow them through all their mirthful and exciting escapades with shaking sides or with eyes that mirror both apprehension and amazement.

Colin Campbell has reproduced the scenes with the skill of a master, and the "Flying U" bunch has been picked with a nicety that defies criticism. The interior of the "Flying U" ranch kitchen, with Patsy in charge, has all the effect on one's risibilities of a clever cartoon, with this difference that the kitchen is not overdrawn, but real. The magnificent view, showing thousands of cattle grazing on the hillside, will soon be an impossibility for the camera to catch, for the great herds have nearly all disappeared. I wish the cameraman could have taken a still picture of this remarkable scene, and that an illustration of it could accompany this review. Millions of people will marvel at the view as seen in the pictures. The yard of the "Fying U" ranch, the sleeping quarters of the cowboys and the "Old Man's" one-story shack, which he calls home, are all in keeping with the West and the time of the story.

Scene from "Chip of the Flying U" (Selig).

But these scenes, true as they are, would create little interest were it not for Chip and Della and Weary and Patsy and the "Old Man," and the other members of this heterogeneous family. Miss Kathlyn Williams and Tom Mix divide honors in the roles of Della and Chip.

The Della of Miss Williams is one of her best photodramatic creations. The buoyant spirits of the girl are never permitted to carry her beyond the line of maidenly decorum; yet they are so sprightly and mischievous in their fun-loving flights that one's eyes follow her in her pranks with delight and laughter. And the tender woman's side of the girl's nature is revealed with delicate touches. Note how endearingly she fondles the head of the unconscious Chip and presses her lips to his again and again when he gets "saddle horned," although she had always tormented him with jealousy and uncertainty in his spooning moods. And how artfully is Chip deceived into believing that her friend, "Dr. Cecil," is a man doctor and not a girl classmate of her own at college. No wonder that Chip in the end had to take the citadel of Della's heart by storm.

Chip must have been a famous cowboy, indeed, if he could have measured up to the outdoor attainments of our own Tom Mix, the undisputed king of the plains. We see Chip, as Tom represents him, in several neck-breaking stunts, in these pictures; but he performs a dare-devil feat that we have never before seen attempted. This is known as being "saddle horned." The rider has lassoed a wild bronch (not broncho, if you please), and is conducting him to the corral by means of the lasso fastened to the horn of his saddle. Without warning, the animal makes a terrific dash (at right-angles to the course taken by the rider's mount) away from his captor. The saddle girth breaks and the dismounted rider, whose feet are entangled in the stirrups, is dragged along the ground at fearful speed—over rough places, uphill and down. It is amazing how Tom Mix comes out of this most dangerous feat with whole, or united, limbs. The pictures, according to the story, show him lying unconscious after the experience, and that would seem a very logical condition—dead, might be still closer to the expected result.

But still more credit is due Tom in these pictures than death-defying feats, on and off horseback. He can justly claim favorable criticism for an intelligent conception and a faithful characterization of Chip's mental and physical make-up. Chip's bashfulness and reticence before Della are well simulated. That vault over the back of his favorite mount, Beauty, to meet the dare in Della's eyes, before she flees for safety from the avowal of his love, is only a symptom of his fixed determination to win her heart and hand there and then.

Frank Clark, happy in memory as Dextry in "The Spoilers," gives a strong comedy delineation of Patsy, cook of the "Flying U" ranch. Fred Huntly as the "Old Man," owner of the ranch, and Wheeler Oakman (the Broncho Kid of "The Spoilers") as Weary are commended for able character work. Our old friend Slap-Jack (Jack McDonald), of "The Spoilers," will be easily recognized among the cowboys.

It will be interesting to many readers to learn that B. M. Bower, author of "Chip of the Flying U," as the story appeared in the Popular Magazine, is Mrs. B. M. Bower. Her stories of western life have afforded delightful reading to millions of readers.

Selig's "Chip of the Flying U" will be released August 29.

GAUMONT SUED FOR INFRINGEMENT.

An action to recover triple damages from the Gaumont Company on the ground that the film concern has been using a motion picture machine which embodies claims described in the Edison reissue patents controlled by the Motion Picture Patents Company is on file in the United States District Court.

John Robert Taylor, counsel for the Motion Picture Patents Company, has procured an order directing the defendant company to show cause why an injunction should not be issued restraining it from manufacturing, selling or leasing the kinetoscopic films manufactured with the alleged infringing machines pending a final determination of the issues raised in the suit.

The complainant alleges that the defendant company has been infringing on the claims covered by the Edison reissue patents which were recently sustained by Judge Mayer since January, 1904. The novelty and utility of the inventions of Thomas A. Edison described in these patents have become widely known and recognized, the complainant recites, and as a result the patents have attained great value.

As a result of the alleged infringement on the part of the defendant the plaintiff alleges it has suffered heavy loss in royalties which would otherwise have accrued to the company, but avers it is unable to accurately measure the amount of the damage. Consequently the complainant asks that the court compel the defendant to make an accounting and pay triple damages.

"Kit the Arkansaw Traveler"

Kalem's Three-Part Reproduction of Chanfrau's Old Drama Makes an Unusually Good Picture.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

WE all should be indebted to the Kalem Company for giving us this fine interpretation of Frank Chanfrau's famous old story. You may, if you will, discount the fact that the writer in his boyhood saw the elder Chanfrau as Kit and that to this day retains lively memories of that performance as well as of quite a number of the lines that were in those days used by the man in the street in the course of daily greetings. The picture was staged by Kenean Buell in Florida, with all the advantages that that section can give in the way of atmosphere—chief of all being the great river steamer on which some of the more thrilling of the incidents took place. Jere Austin makes a fine Kit Redding; he has the physique and the bearing that match the demands of the character. He is adequate as the woodsman and trapper; but he shows to real advantage as the traveler experienced in the ways of the world and especially so with the ways of river gamblers.

Ben Ross plays Manuel Bond, the scoundrel who brings about the death of Mary Redding and in later years uses the daughter of Mary as a decoy in his gambling operations. He is a villain of real life, not of melodrama. Alice Hollister is delightful in the role of Mary Redding, the girl who so romantically and almost on sight marries Kit following her escape from Bond, to be abducted and brought to her death a half dozen years later. Marguerite Courtot, who as Alice Redding enters the second phase of the story as the ward of Bond, is convincing in her youthful vivacity.

The importance of the Judge and the Major, who contributed so notable a comedy element to the play, has been minimized in the picture—they are not even identified by subtitle—but nevertheless they furnish lighter touches that bring relief from some of the more tense situations. Ben Walker is the Judge and Sam Stillwell the Major.

The three reels are deeply interesting. There is a strong situation right at the opening of the story, as Bond, intrusted by the parents of Mary with the temporary guardianship of the daughter, violates the confidence and attempts to force his attentions on the girl. Her escape through the window of the hotel, her refuge with the family traveling across country, her meeting with Kit and marriage are quickly shown. The visit a half dozen years later of Bond and his abduction of the wife and five-year-old daughter provide thrills. The meeting of Kit with Bond after a lapse of fifteen years is the beginning of a series of rapid, cumulating events that end with the death of the gambler, the reunion of father and daughter and incidentally the paternal blessing on another union between the daughter and the young man who has been so devoted to her in her later trials.

There are moments of pathos in this drama, as when the grown daughter boarding the steamer has her attention arrested by the lively tune played by the Traveler on the violin he has taken from a deckhand; there is to her an unaccountable familiarity, a pull to it. So, too, the later chat on the boat, and the slow revelation of their relationship. There are scenes aplenty that stir the blood in the robbing of the young man by the gamblers, the burning of the craft, the striking down of the Traveler, his escape on a bale of cotton, his encounter with Bond, and the short and sharp duel with Bowies. The struggling men disappear below the surface of the river; the bubbles are succeeded by the appearance and disappearance of an arm. Then slowly comes into view the head and shoulders of the Traveler. Brutal, indeed, it is; but it is unlikely there will be any complaint.

"Kit the Arkansaw Traveler" is a mighty good picture.

"The Devil's Fiddle"

(Three Parts—Apex.)

TWO of the strongest players in "Sealed Orders," the admiral and the officer's wife, are engaged in this Apex feature. They both live up to their reputation. Another very capable artist is introduced to play the part of the weird gypsy who is an expert with the "Devil's Fiddle."

The director of this feature knew how to mingle the sensational and the mysterious and the daring in very cunning proportions. The strain of gypsy blood in the beautiful model of a painter is strangely stirred by the strains of a violin played by the master of the gypsy camp. The girl finds herself unable to resist the compelling lure of the fiddle and follows the fiddler who develops her wonderful dancing ability to the utmost. As an Indian dancer she becomes famous and the artist whom she loves hears of her again. The ending is unexpected and makes a powerful climax.

The settings are superb and the photography of even excellence throughout. It is a meritorious production and acceptable on any program.

"The Chimes"

A Two-Reel Hepworth Visualization of a Humanizing Story by Charles Dickens.

Trotty Veck.....Warwick Buckland
Alderman Cute.....Tom Butt

Richard.....Stewart Rome
Sir Richard Bowley.....Harry Gilbey
Will Fern.....John MacAndrews
Lilian.....Miss Muriel Smith

LIKE most of the Dickens' short stories, "The Chimes" has a softening influence and leaves an impression that all is well in the human heart. Great care has been taken to shadow forth the people and scenes in accurate costume and environment, hence it is a delight to the eyes, this picturing of what the master described by means of his marvelous command of English. The sincerity of purpose behind Dickens' productions reflects his own character in a degree, and it is to be hoped that they will exert the same beneficent influence when visualized, cheering, encouraging and sweetening human existence.

Scene from "The Chimes" (Hepworth).

The story of Trotty Veck extending the hand of friendship to a man in dire extremity, sharing his last shilling with Will Fern and sheltering him when he has just carried an order for his arrest from Sir Richard Bowley to Alderman Cute, is in itself a lesson, but the dream, that might well have been reality is another to be remembered. Will Fern is merely a vagrant driven by poverty and misfortune to the edge of desperation. The hand of organized society is against him, just as it is to-day. He is an "undesirable," a "defective," a tramp. To half frozen and half starved Trotty Veck this social outcast is a human being to be regenerated by kindness. But Trotty is in such depths of poverty himself that he would not be blamed for heeding the natural impulses such as that springing from the instinct of self-preservation. "The Chimes" sounding in his ears, bringing their suggestion of good will towards men, rouses in him that warmth of heart that radiated during all-too-few years from the great novelist himself.

Scene from "The Chimes" (Hepworth).

The personality of Dickens, intensely sympathetic, broadly humanitarian, wondrously magnetic, reached out to all parts of the English-speaking world through his novels and short stories, and here, again, it is reviving through the medium of moving pictures, to be set before millions and again shed its sunshine on suffering humanity. The Hepworth visualization is both consistent and humanizing. Like the work of the master, it is done thoroughly, and it contains the message he sent forth in each Christmas story.

It tells the selfish man to rid himself of selfishness, the just man to make himself generous, and the good-natured man to enlarge the sphere of his good nature. Its cheery voice of faith and hope carries pleasant warning to all, that if the duties of Christmas are lacking, no good can come out of its outward observances; that it must shine upon the cold hearth and warm it, and unto the sorrowful heart and comfort it. It must be kindness, benevolence, charity, mercy and forbearance.

Mary Fuller Does Battle With Snake

SOMETHING is always "happening to Mary." The latest thrill to be added to this girl's life is a battle with a snake in which said snake met his Waterloo. Mary Fuller, with director, Walter Edwin, and a company of some thiry-five players, is at present up in Blue Ridge mountains, Shohola, Pike County, Pa., putting on a three-reel Universal feature, "The Heart of the Night Winds." The hotel people affirmed there hadn't been a snake in the "Crick," which comes down from the big falls at Shohola, for twenty years. But when Mary pulled off her white stockings and little black shoes and began to "sozzle" her pink toes around in the water, a big water mocassin lifted its head from the moss across the stream and admiring beauty from afar, slipped into the water and swam quickly over to pay his respects to "our movie heroine." No, Mary didn't shriek or run, but grasped a hickory stick and waited.

Mary Fuller.

"I'll spank you, naughty snake," she warned.

But with blood in his eye he darted at her leg. After a series of terrific "Whacks," the big mottled black lay still, and Mary was safe to go wading.

"DOINGS OF THE EASTERN SCENARIO DEPARTMENT."

What with the big editions made in the production ranks of the Universal's eastern companies, the company's scenario department, under the supervision of Jack Bryne, scenario editor, has been burning the night oil in order to carry out their work with the fullest amount of efficiency.

Captain Leslie T. Peacocke during the past week has written a two-reel comedy entitled "The Friend of the Family." He just completed adapting the photoplay form "The Heart of the Night Wind" from the novel. It is being produced by Miss Mary Fuller's company.

George Hall is the author of "The Man Who Is Misunderstood," a two-reel drama, that is under production with King Baggot in the lead. George Lessy is directing this picture.

Stewart Paton is author of "Tempest and Sunshine," a two-reel drama that is being staged by the Imp Company under the direction of Frank Crane.

Mr. McClellan, Mr. Brenon, Miss Murillo, F. J. May and J. Frager are all engaged in special script reading, looking over magazines, novels and other material.

"Uncle Tom's Cabin"

World Film Corporation Releasing a Strong Portrayal of the Famous Old Story.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THE World Film Corporation released on August 10 a five-part adaptation of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," the book that if it did not make history powerfully contributed to the making of it. As to the stage interpretation of Mrs. Stowe's work few communities have been too small to have had their periodic visits from Uncle Tom troupes—no play in the last half century has reached more remote parts of the country. It is fitting that we should have a screen portrayal that treats this famous story seriously, one which reflects the atmosphere of the South and the spirit of the author of the book.

Scene from "Uncle Tom's Cabin" (World Film).

The picture was produced by Bob (William Robert) Daly, under the general management of J. V. Ritchey. Mr. Daly has chosen to follow the book rather than the stage version. He has shown good judgment in his presentation; fine discrimination in depicting pathos so that it never verges on bathos—and this all the more notable by reason of the fact that of necessity he was using many colored players, a majority of whom, it is fair to assume, had had no camera experience. He was particularly happy in his selection of Uncle Tom. This character was portrayed by Sam Lucas, the seventy-two-year old negro who has for years taken the part on the legitimate stage and who also has had training before the lens. Lucas is the center of interest throughout the picture. His work is dignified and displays a grasp of dramatic values.

Marie Eline, long known on the screen as the "Thanhouser Kid," has the part of Little Eva. No odds need be asked on account of her childhood. Her characterization of the happy little daughter of the St. Clairs is charming, her portrayal of the decline and death is worthy of an adult. Topsy, that famous child of nature who "just growed," is renewed to us by Boots Wall, who finely depicts the colored girl with the "acquiring" habits. Irving Cummings and Teresa Michelena in the roles of George Harris and Eliza provide the dramatic interest in the earlier part of the picture. Simon Legree is played by Roy Applegate. Paul Scardon is Mr. Hanley, the slave dealer. The cast, numbering twenty-four, is good throughout.

It is no stage ice on which Eliza crosses the river. The real article is present in abundance. In the scene where little Eva falls overboard from the stern-wheel steamer and Uncle Tom jumps to the rescue there may be some inclined to criticise the detail of the action as registered by the camera. It seems that Uncle Tom could not swim and that Little Eva could, in spite of the story, and that the child was compelled to do what she could to support the old man until the cameraman jumped in and straightened matters out. Another case of truth being stranger than fiction.

We are told that the picture has been booked far ahead in New York, which would indicate that those exhibitors who have had a chance to see it liked it. That's the whole story after all.

EARLE WILLIAMS

EARLE WILLIAMS, the Vitagraph motion picture star, was born in Sacramento, California, February 28, 1880. His father was Agustus P. Williams, an early California settler who had emigrated from Booneville, Mo. His mother was Eva M. Paget, of the Paget family from Cincinnati, Ohio. The famous old actor, James Paget, who was at the height of his career a generation ago, was an uncle and the only member of Mr. Williams' immediate family connected with the profession of acting.

Earle Williams.

Earle Williams was educated in the Oakland Public, grammar and high schools and attended the Polytechnic College of California, but left before receiving his degree. His first position was as an office boy sandwiched in prior to his entering college. His first theatrical engagement was as utility man with the Baldwin-Melville Stock Company in New Orleans, in 1901. His principal engagements have been with the Frederick Belasco Stock Company in San Francisco and Portland; one year with James Neill Stock Company; heavy with Henry Dixie in "The Man on the Box"; heavy with Rose Stahl in "The Chorus Lady"; juvenile in Mary Mannering's "Glorious Betsey" and with Helen Ware in "The Third Degree." His last theatrical engagement was with George Beban in "The Sign of the Rose" in vaudeville.

Mr. Williams' entrance into pictures was not premeditated. The usual idleness during the summer while engaged in theatricals proved irksome, so, as a matter of passing the time, he applied for extra parts with the Vitagraph Company. Being the possessor of ideal qualifications for a motion picture actor, together with his splendid stock company training, soon permitted Mr. Williams to occupy an enviable position in the motion picture world. At the present time he is an international favorite, and his entire motion picture career has been with the Vitagraph Company of America.

Some of his principal pictures are "The Christian," in which he played John Storm, "Love's Sunset," "Vengeance of Durand," "Memories That Haunt," "Lovesick Maidens of Cuddleton," "The Dawning," "The Red Barrier," "Two Women and Two Men," "The Love of John Ruskin," "The Bond of Music," "The Test of Friendship" and "The Thumb Print."

"Lay Down Your Arms."

Baroness Bertha Von Suttner's World-Famous Tract Against Militarism Makes Deep Impression as Pictured by Great Northern.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

WHERE war lays out its shambles, dead and wounded together; where its victims, lacking shelter, are huddled along the wall outside; where death swings its scythe; where there is heart-break and hopeless wailing at home; where pestilence, crept in from the putrid fields, is devastating quiet villages, this is where the picture, "Lay Down Your Arms," takes us. It shows us these things not to give us divertisement, but earnestly and solemnly to give us satiety and disgust at war as war was seen by the Baroness Bertha Von Suttner, who wrote the novel, from which the picture is taken, to open the world's eyes to the horrors of war and militarism. The picture, too, was produced with a purpose; it was ordered by the peace advocates and was intended to form a part of the regular program at the peace convocation that was purposed to be held at Vienna this summer, but isn't to be held at all. Yet the picture will serve a good purpose and be its own peace convention wherever it is shown.

Scene from "Lay Down Your Arms" (Great Northern).

The Great Northern studio is noted for the artistic quality of its photography and for dramatic stories as well. The spectator will find the beautiful camera work exemplified in this picture, for it has some of the loveliest of scenes and most charming of pictures. On the other hand, whenever its purpose is to show gashes and wounds, it is just as effective. The story was built, not to be merely dramatic, but to serve the author's purpose and is somewhat arbitrary, though emotional—it is a tract and we have never seen a tract that was not over-accented. It opens showing us a beautiful home in a militarist country. There has recently been a war and sorrows due to war have already visited it. Then war breaks out again and the same shadows once more come with anxiety and dread. These scenes have been produced in a dignified way and are followed by freshly conceived battle pictures showing an advance of foreign troops across the frontier followed by a rout. They are exciting scenes, but there is none of the usual feeling about them. The glory of war is a matter of mental attitude solely; this picture keeps in view only the horrors of war and the enthusiasm is kept religiously out of sight. After war has done its worst, pestilence comes to finish the job and add more anguish.

Scene from "Lay Down Your Arms" (Great Northern).

How will it go in your show, Mr. Exhibitor? It is a competently made picture of a novel that was sold all over the world. That it will be counted a wholesome lesson, there is no doubt. If you show it, some of your patrons may say to you, "It's a good picture and, though I didn't find it entertaining, I'm glad you rented it. We need such a picture. It'll do us good. It will help to convince the world that motion picture shows are doing their part in raising us to higher things." Others may say that it is a weakling picture of weaklings who lacked the courage and selfishly were unable to bear sorrow and loss for the sake of maintaining a fire on the national hearth. But these latter will be only the few; the many will heartily commend its purpose. If this country had just gone through a terrible war, it would be too poignant a picture to show. Under such conditions, some one would be sure to bellow and set the whole house to sobbing. But there are some of us who truly need to be shown that war is what a certain general called it.

OLCOTT IN THE GAP OF DUNLOE.

One of the most picturesque spots in Ireland is the beautiful Gap of Dunloe, near which the Sid Olcott company have their headquarters for the summer while doing some real Irish features with genuine backgrounds. The accompanying picture was taken in this beautiful gorge between two big mountains through which thousands of tourists pass every year.

The Gap is on the regular route from Killarney to the lakes, the trip being made by carriage, jaunting car or sight seeing coach as far as the Gap, then seven miles through the Gap on ponies and then down the lakes by row boats, back to Ross castle, where jaunting cars or coaches pick up their parties and take them to Killarney.

Valentine Grant and Pat O'Malley of the Olcott Company.

There was a small revolution in the Gap about six years ago when the Cook's Tours Company attempted to run their big sight seeing coaches through the Gap to the Lakes. There are about a hundred and twenty pony boys in the Gap and these men make their living hauling the tourists, of whom there are about a hundred and fifty or two hundred every day. But the pony boys did not intend to be thrown out of what they considered their own and so they tore up the roads and went up the mountain side with their rifles and shot down a few horses on the coaches until the Irish constabulary were called out. But even the police were unable to cope with the brave, hardy mountaineers who were fighting for what they considered their lawful rights by heritage and finally the Cook company was forced to give up the battle.

"The Valley of the Moon"

Jack London's Delightful Story Done in Six Parts by the Bosworth, Inc.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

"THE Valley of the Moon" is an achievement in story telling by the cleverest American story teller of the day. Transposed into films it has become a fairy tale. We may be disposed to quarrel with this feature as a dramatic production, but before we get very far in our carping criticism we are disarmed by the charm which a well-told fairy tale has not alone for children, but for grown-ups as well. Much is allowed to a story teller which would be unpermisible in a dramatist. The dramatist is bound by rules, the story teller has a general literary dispensation and we forgive him every thing if he only entertains us in the telling of the story. The story teller is permitted to spin out minor incidents, to digress into by-paths and to wield his magic wand generally, regardless and even in defiance of ordinary regulations. Judged by these standards the "Valley of the Moon" is a gem of rare radiance. As a dramatic feature in the stricter sense of the word it is open to many objections, of which undue lengthening of minor scenes and unconnected episodes are perhaps the gravest.

Scene from "The Valley of the Moon" (Bosworth).

The story of Jack London tells of a young couple which finds itself "cribbed, cabined and confined" in the narrow straits and the unnatural intimacy of a big town and escapes from insufferable chains into the glories of the superb lands of California. There are many very pretty scenes in the film, but none prettier, none more charmingly fabulous than the stopping of Billy and Saxon in front of the old farm, where they are greeted by a sweet, aged couple and told that the country through which they were passing was Sonoma, which is the Indian name for Valley of the Moon. Billy and Saxon had been looking for a perfect piece of land, which their friends had told them could only be found in the Valley of the Moon and here come two kind spirits and tell them they have found their heart's desire just as they were beginning to despair. The scenes on the beautiful coast, where the Abalone eaters live in primitive happiness and amused defiance of all convention and civilization will be liked by most audiences. It gives us a glimpse of Jack London's wonderful imagination at its best. There are contrasts between city and country most skilfully and entertainingly conceived and carried out. The pugilistic adventures of the hero of the story are portrayed with great cleverness. Throughout we find fine film renderings of Jack London's best points, his intimate revelations with their autobiographic vein, his marvelous powers of description and the spirit of poetry and romance in which he treats of the modern and the commonplace.

Jack Conway made an unqualified success of the most difficult part of Billy Roberts. He has a strong individuality which knows how to assert itself. Myrtle Stedman as Saxon was not altogether convincing, she was a bit theatrical. In stronger hands her part might have added wonderfully to the general merit of the production. The settings left nothing to be desired and the photography was with but few exceptions quite good.

"European Armies in Action"

George Kleine Offers Four Reels, Showing Most of the European Armies at Their Manoeuvers.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

AT this time when any news, or even any account, of what is going on in Europe is eagerly paid for—extras have become a habit with us—this four-reel offering by George Kleine is surely noteworthy. It is, for the most part, a technical picture of the arms, equipments and drill of almost all the European armies. But there is also much human interest in it. There are, for instance, a glimpse of the late Crown Prince Francis Ferdinand of Austria, and a view of Germany's Crown Prince commanding his troops. Then—and this will appeal most to the general spectator—it gives many close-up pictures of the faces of the troopers and sailors. It lets us see what kind of a fellow the French soldier, or sailor, is and to compare him personally with those men of the Kaiser's army that are at hand. Then we see how the Belgian crack cavalry officer can ride—a spectacular, circus-like exhibition—and how the Swiss cavalry conducts itself is also made plain to us. Again, the typical Montenegrin soldier stands out before us and we get a good idea of how his artillery works in battle. The British scenes are the only poorly photographed parts of the offering. This section is short and is clear enough to be very instructive as showing the English regular handling big naval guns on rough land. The picture has many good views of battleships and shows something of the manufacture of the great thirteen-inch guns for ships of war. The photography, taking it as a whole, is most commendable. The offering includes some lovely scenes of Paris, taken from a big dirigible floating over the city.

The French army pictures take more of the film than do those of any other army and seem to be very complete, showing many of the famous corps, the airmen, the artillery in action, a bayonet charge, and riflery drill as on the field of battle. We see things that are actually happening now in war times abroad. The French commanders are seen; but their names are not put on the screen. The giving of the cross of the Legion of Honor to a French naval officer is a picture that many will be thankful for. Perhaps the second most interesting item is the faces of the Servian and Montenegrin soldiers, though some may be more interested in seeing the British men slinging a heavy field gun across a chasm while others will be most attracted by the German boys loading and firing their field guns—they are said to be among the most accurate gunners in the world.

Summing up, we commend this as an unusually valuable and timely offering. It will interest all, and to many in the audience there will be in it strong appeals to patriotism when they see perhaps some relative of theirs at his gun or rifle or on his horse serving his country in the home land. A good offering.

TWIST BUYS SHIPMAN'S FILM INTERESTS.

It was learned this week that Stanly H. Twist and Ernest Shipman, who have been closely associated during the past two years in different film propositions, have discontinued their partnership. Twist has purchased Shipman's stock in the Inter-Ocean Sales Company, whose offices are located in the World's Tower Building, and has taken over all of his present film interests and marketing contracts. Mr. Twist states the reason for Mr. Shipman's temporary retirement from business is ill health and a desire on Mr. Shipman's part to concentrate on some personal plans which he prefers not to make public yet.

JAY HAWKER EVENTS.

The Kansas Motion Picture Company of Wichita, Kan., gets out a weekly topical called "Jay Hawker Events" which pictures a series of happenings during the week in Kansas. The newly opened "Holland Theater" of Wichita is making the picture one of the weekly features of its program. This idea of booming Kansas to Kansas people and their guests seems to us worthy of warm commendation. Business and prosperity are usually more a matter of getting acquainted than of anything else; that is why business people advertise. If this weekly topical is properly conducted it will be full of matter that will be not only of absorbing interest, but that will both suggest new business and stimulate old. The time will come when boards of trade and the like will be "pushing" organized effort along these very lines. There has been a good deal of desultory activity of the kind; but to get results with any kind of advertising you have to be interesting and to keep people interested; you have got to get them expecting something valuable from you all the time.

"The Call of the North"

Five Parts. Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Co.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

SUCH pictures as these amply confirm my faith in the approaching kingdom of quality. The dominant characteristic of the play is lavishness. A lofty ambition to attain the highest ideals in the motion picture art gave birth to this feature, which I am tempted to describe as one of the greatest classics ever produced on American soil. The theme is classic, its treatment is classic, the atmosphere is classic. Best of all the theme is distinctly of the New World; it deals with one of the strangest and most romantic phases of life in the Far North.

In the days when the Hudson Bay Trading Company exercised a sovereign and undisputed sway over the great fur-bearing country of the North the word of the factor was law. Indeed there was no other law. No hunting or trading was permitted in all the vast domain without the permission of this most daring and most grasping of all monopolies.

An humble retainer of the great corporation has a beautiful daughter, whose hand is sought by one of her own station. The man does not please her and she repels him. A few days after the rejection the factor, seeking a friendly shelter after an accident on his journey, visits the cabin of the father. The factor has a commanding personality, his very appearance and movements speak of the conscious possession of great power. The girl is fascinated by the strength and the personality of the man and agrees to marry him. It is the old story of the oak and the ivy. The frail beauty of the girl, her absolute devotion and submission to the stronger will, her clinging tenderness are most charmingly portrayed on the screen. The rejected suitor comes to the factor in search of employment. He meets with a curt refusal and is about to turn away when the woman, who had repelled him to become the factor's wife, appears and recognizes him. She bears him no malice; herself supremely happy she wants others to be happy too. At her solicitations then Rand, the rejected wooer, is taken into the employ of the factor. From that moment forth Rand plots to wreck and ruin. He plots like Iago himself, blindly, out of an evil heart, naturally impervious to every good and wholesome influence.

Scene from "The Call of the North" (Lasky).

Graehme Stewart, a widower and the factor's trusted lieutenant, lives at the trading post with his five year old son. The young wife of the factor, herself about to become a mother, has grown very fond of the little boy and delights to watch him at his childish play. Upon one such occasion the father of the little chap is present and the three make a very pretty group as they sit on a carpet of snow with the brown trees for a background. Rand sees them and his black heart swells with envy and bitterness. He calls the factor and points to the group remarking with a sneer, that it looked fine. Thus was sown the seed of suspicion, which was destined to bear such bloody and tragic fruit.

The young wife sends a pretty token, a small pouch ornamented with beads in the form of a cross to her aged father for a Christmas present and writes a little note bearing the words: with kindest love. The note she puts in the token. Rand is chosen as the messenger to bring the token and much wine and food to the father. He delivers the wine and the food, but keeps the token. When he returns from his errand he happens upon Stewart and his little boy, trying out a small bow and arrow before the cabin of an Indian. The wife of the factor has joined the group and mingles her laughter with the shouts of the father and the cries of the child. Rand, a demon of mischief, rushes into Stewart's cabin and secretes the token and message meant for the young wife's father on Stewart's table. Then he hastens to the factor's office. Again he leads him out to look at the young wife and Stewart as they stand full of exuberant joy at the door of the Indian's cabin. The spark of jealousy kindles into a blaze. While the factor is still suffering with doubt and distrust Rand rushes him into Stewart's cabin and "discovers" the token with the message. "Trifles light as air" confirm the suspicions of the jealous; the factor is convinced that Stewart, younger than himself has sought to tamper with the affections of his wife. He even suspects his wife, but one look into her clear, unflinching eyes convince him that the guilt is all Stewart's and he plans a terrible punishment. He has Stewart brought before him and despite all his protests sentences him to "la longue traverse," the long journey, which is a polite phrase for the voyage of death. This was a favorite punishment dealt out by the Hudson Trading Company to men whom it chosed to regard as trespassers upon its domain and the factor vengefully inflicts it upon Stewart. He who is to enter upon the fatal journey must go without food and without weapons. An Indian called "the shadow of death" is sent with him to follow close upon his trail to make sure of the journey's tragic end. For five days Stewart wanders through the wilderness until outraged nature succumbs and he dies miserably in the trackless forest.

Twenty years pass away. Stewart's boy who wears the token which cost his father's life about his neck, has grown to manhood. The factor's wife has died leaving him a charming image of her own youth. Young Stewart is caught trading in defiance of the factor and is like his father sent on the "long journey." The factor's daughter, however, touched with pity at the young man's plight befriends him. She supplies him with a rifle and with food. Before he can get away with these precious life savers he is surprised by the factor's Indians and brought back to the post. Refusing to tell who gave him the rifle he is sentenced to be hung when the daughter confesses that she gave him rifle and food. The old factor, in no way softened, abides by his determination to put the young man to death.

Rand has been repulsed by a young Indian woman, on whom he sought to force his attentions. The girl is in love with a half-breed employed at the post. Rand tells her that he knows how the half-breed had given young Stewart a knife in defiance of the factor's decree. Rand goes into a boat to give the knife to the factor across the lake to make sure that the lover of the girl would be hanged. In her despair the girl shoots and mortally wounds the blackmailing devil just as he is nearing the shore. He is brought to land by the factor and with death impending over him tells the true story of the token and his own fiendish work. The factor sends messengers after young Stewart who are just in the nick of time to save him from destruction. A magnificent climax follows called "The Atonement," a title, which I think might safely have been adopted as the main title. It is a scene of overpowering spectacular and dramatic force.

Robert Edeson, in the dual role of Graehme and Ned

Stewart, lived up to his best reputation. Every part was in splendid hands. I would like to tell of the superb settings, furnished by the Californian wonderland, of the masterly direction, of the conscientious regard for detail such as the reproduction of a real trading post, etc. Space forbids. The photography is a perpetual delight.

"The Last Volunteer"

Eclectic's Five-Part War Story Is Strong Both in Dramatic and Spectacular Elements.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

IN "The Last Volunteer," a five-part production, the Eclectic Company has an excellent as well as a most timely release. There are well staged battle scenes in the final reel which complement in striking fashion the strong dramatic interest which runs through the story. The picture was produced by Oscar Apfel what time he was with the Pathe Company and before he resigned to take up work with the Lasky forces. Mr. Apfel successfully scoured the metropolitan district for backgrounds adequate in magnitude for the portrayal of the exteriors of palaces and places of one of the smaller European kingdoms.

The story is located in Saxe-Tholberg; on hair-trigger terms with this mythical principality is Austrania. The plot is of a prince who, in disguise meets and falls in love with the daughter of an innkeeper. Later the exigencies of politics decree that the prince shall marry a woman of his own station, to which necessity he submits. Katrina overhears a conversation between an officer and the ambassador of Austrania in which the latter dickers for the mobilization plans of Saxe-Tholberg. With the aid of her soldier brother she attempts to prevent the carrying out of the conspiracy. The ambassador is killed. Austrania insists that the murderer be executed, on penalty of war. At the last moment the prince responds to the pleas of Katrina, saves the life of the brother and accepts war. In a battle Katrina volunteers to raise a signal which will result in the defeat of the enemy and end a war which she feels she was responsible for beginning. She is killed.

Eleanor Woodruff splendidly plays the role of Katrina. She brings to the part a sympathy and skill which appeal. Paul Panzer is the conniving ambassador who tries to secure the vital plans. His work is of his best. Robert Broderick is Von Tromp, marshal of Saxe-Tholberg. Mr. Broderick has much to do, and in it all he displays the strength and quality that always characterizes his interpretations. Irving Cummings finely typifies Prince Ludwig. There is a large and competent cast.

Some of the best situations are those between Ardelheim, Katrina's brother, and the prince, in which the incognito ruler is asked as to his intentions; there is an approach to a duel, narrowly averted. The tense scenes surrounding the attempted bribery and the slaying of the ambassador hold tight. So, too, do the appeals of Katrina for her brother's life and her unbelieved insistence that she committed the deed, resulting in the pardon and the contingent war. The battle scenes are realistic. They ought to be, as portraying them are regular artillerymen of the United States Army. The conclusion of these is a singular blending of the dramatic with the spectacular. The strongest moment of the story is its ending, as Katrina, surrounded by the prince and the court, gives up her life.

"The Last Volunteer" will be the feature of the program at Hammerstein's Lexington Avenue Opera House, the great structure with a seating capacity of 3,300, which opens its doors to the picturegoing public on August 22. It is said there will be an orchestra of fifty pieces.

British Notes

THE United Kingdom Photographic Convention, an annual gathering for photographers in Great Britain, has just been concluded in Perth, Scotland, after a most successful session. It was in 1890 when this convention met at Chester that the first moving picture camera was demonstrated, and reference was made to the fact by the president. This instrument in its early form was before the advent of the word "projector" or "kinematograph" and we find it described as "a camera which has been constructed for taking photographs by merely turning a handle, which takes a series of negatives on a sensitive band at the rate of 600 a minute."

The practice of snapping up a notable or a much boosted film (the qualifications are not always synonymous), still finds favor in the Metropolitan film market despite the continued grumble of many small exhibitors who aver that the practice is detrimental to the best interests of the trade. This week the second Broadway feature of the Vitagraph Co. has been sold as an exclusive to the Globe Film Co.

The company of United States players under the leadership of Sidney Olcott, at present engaged in feature film producing in the south of Ireland, may possibly come in for exciting times. Ireland is practically in a state of civil war owing to the Home Rule discussion, and while Olcott and his company were rehearsing near Killarney last week a party of the National Volunteers were drilling in the next field. Writing of war pictures it is worth mentioning that some good realistic views are expected in London any moment of the fall of the Servian capital at the hands of the Austrians. So far only two camera-men are on the field of action, and both are respresentatives of French firms.

W. N. Selig, of Chicago, reached London this week on the "Imperator," and will spend a few days watching the progress of "Kathlyn" on this side.

Messrs. Bishops, Pessers & Co., who are the representatives in Britain of the Balboa Film Co., have started a new campaign of publicity for this brand which, although a comparative newcomer, has attained a noteworthy connection. This week they have decided to start upon a bold experiment and announce that henceforth they are prepared to hire films direct to exhibitors from the London office.

"He Danced Himself to Death"

Vitagraph Tries Its Hand at Farce in Comic Vein—Ralph Ince in It Makes Roars of Laughter.

Reviewed by Hanford Judson.

FOR one reason or another, American audiences of the present day, whether they be of the high, low, or intermediate cranial curvature and Bertillonic frontal measurement, are fond of the comically nonsensical in pictures. A chase by a lot of crazy cops; a man running with a baby carriage and a crowd after him, spiced with eccentric camera work: these are things that today invariably bring roars of laughter from the amusement-loving crowd.

"He Danced Himself to Death," a Vitagraph offering to be released in September, is a picture of this kind. Both of its two reels are packed with fresh comic stunts and it is, we feel sure, destined to make a big hit with the licensed group audiences. Though of the same general kind as the Keystone farces, it is distinctly Vitagraph and full of nothing but the Vitagraph quality—it reminds one more of "A Regiment of Two," than of any other picture we can remember—we refer, of course, only to the general flavor of the picture. This is partly because the Vitagraph camera always sees with its own eye, but most because the scheme, written by R. L. ("Rube") Goldberg, the cartoonist, lives on a new idea and creates a fresh "character."

Scene from "He Danced Himself to Death" (Vitagraph).

This queer being delightfully played by Ralph Ince, who is also the picture's producer, is full of that peculiar woodenness and craziness that is so necessary to creating the only atmosphere in which these comics are truly enjoyable. One reason why attempts at this kind of work by picture makers so often fail is because so few actors have the ability to reach the heights where irrational inhumanity become dream-like and convincing. First-class clowns command good salaries; they deserve it, for there are few of them. In this case, the leading player is wholly unrecognizable under his clownish make-up and through his artful irresponsibility.

The picture has a good opening. It shows Mr. Producer (Ince) of the Vitagraph studio at his wit's end to make a comedy. His friend "Rube" Goldberg comes to see him. "Rube" will write a comedy and while he has his pen on paper, Ralph, standing beside him, turns slowly into a convincing, but quite unbelievable character whom Rube with true creation-like authority, orders to go to work. We soon find the outlandish thing paying for dancing lessons by mail and they begin to come. When he puts them into practice the nightmare begins and so does the laughter. The subtitles are also amusing and, for the most part, very commendable. The photography, some of it is cleverly contrived to add to the fun in the action, is serviceable. This two-part comic offering will be very welcome and exhibitors should find it a good investment.

"Shockingly Misinformed"

So Says French Motion Picture Publication of Frank J. Marion Who Wrote That Cinematographic Conditions in the Land of the Marseillaise are Deplorable.

SOMETHING besides war news is coming out of France. The issue of Le Courrier Cinematographique dated July 18, speaking in an authoritative way as one of the leading French publications devoted to animated photography, carries an editorial article in which strong exception is taken to statements made by Frank J. Marion in the special number of the Moving Picture World, under the caption of "French Conditions Unfavorable." The Courrier's article has been called to the attention of The World by C. Patin, American representative of the Eclair Film Co., Inc., who not only feels much the same way as the man who wrote the Courrier's answer to Mr. Marion, but has also noticed that The World's publication over Mr. Marion's signature stirred up a great deal of adverse criticism among representatives of the big French companies operating in the United States and the French motion picture executives on their native heath.

The Courrier's comment upon Mr. Marion's article is a part of an appreciation of the enterprise of the Moving Picture World in providing the splendid special number, which it considered an unusually comprehensive handling of the motion picture industry throughout the United States and Europe. The exceptions taken to Mr. Marion's statements reflecting upon the business in France are couched in the most dignified language and, as it will be observed, find no fault with either Mr. Marion or the Moving Picture World, but rather express regret that Mr. Marion has been "shockingly misinformed by those from whom he obtained his data."

The extract from Le Courrier is as follows:

We wish to take exception to an article published in the Moving Picture World in which the conditions of the French cinematographic industry are described as unfavorable to the development of that industry and expressing the opinion that it is even now on a decline. The author of this article, who is evidently very incorrectly informed, states that the reason for this condition of affairs is the character of the films exhibited in our motion picture shows.

"It is almost impossible," says he, "to find an American or English film of any account in the French moving picture shows. Nothing but highly sensational and immoral films can be seen. In the streets of Paris, one is stopped at every turn by solicitors for moving picture shows of improper character."

The Courrier denies in the most energetic way the first part of the above quotation. The magnificent productions of Pathe, Freres, Gaumont, L. Aubert, and the Eclair Company stand out amongst hosts of other marks too well known the world over to leave any doubt as to the error of the above statement. The good faith of our colleague has evidently been misplaced. Moreover, he will have but to take a glance at the novelties offered in the Courrier to note a weekly average of 100 films, comprising some excellent French and American ones, as well as some of other nationalities. As to lewd films our colleague is badly informed, as they do not exist. The French law is extremely severe in this regard. Not only the manufacturer, but also the exchange and the exhibitor are liable to two years' imprisonment. Our confrere has been shockingly misinformed by those from whom he obtained his data.

KLEINE BOOKS WAR FILM.

George Kleine is now booking a highly interesting and timely four reel War Film entitled "European Armies in Action." The subject shows many splendid views of the soldiers and sailors now engaged and is varied enough in subject matter to be highly acceptable to audiences of all kinds. Some of the matter contained is: Glimpses of his Imperial Highness Crown Prince Francis Ferdinand of Austria, reviewing the Austrian military forces; The French army in action; Life aboard a French battleship; German artillery maneuvers; Belgium cavalry in action; The Servian and Montenegrin armies; British field gun evolutions; Swiss army maneuvers; How thirteen-inch guns are manufactured. This film is being booked through the various Kleine offices around the country.

"The $5,000,000 Counterfeiting Plot"

Detective Burns Himself Appears in Dramatic Picture of His Greatest Case—A Packed House Receives the Offering Enthusiastically.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THERE is no doubt at all that the new Dramascope six-part picture, showing how Detective William J. Burns handled the great Philadelphia-Lancaster counterfeiting mystery, is going to be a success. It deserves it, not because it is instructive—it is instructive—but because it is so absorbingly entertaining. In all its six reels there is not one foot of noticeable padding. There is a large cast of characters and among them there is not one that is not satisfying, while six or seven of them are thoroughly delightful. The action called for backgrounds in three cities, and the picture is full of typical scenes—in Washington with its great administration buildings, on New York streets, and in Philadelphia. All were photographed as the eye sees them. Then the action that passes through these scenes has been produced so naturally that one forgets that he is looking at a work of art. The camera might have been on the job at the start and "got its story" while the original players were not actors nor acting. A very critical eye might see two little places where the business isn't quite so beyond the question, as to whether it was exactly as shown or not, as is most of it. It is a picture strong to grip the audience and it made them applaud at the right moments and heartily. "The $5,000,000 Counterfeiting Plot" is truly a big feature offering for the most critical patron and the least so.

Scene from "The $5,000,000 Counterfeiting Plot" (Dramascope).

At the New York Theater, where it was shown to a packed house, Detective Burns was himself introduced and made, before the picture was put on the screen, a few interesting remarks about it. He said that the producers took "a few liberties with the action that they claim entitled to." Let us add that they made good. Mr. Burns drew attention to the educative value of the picture as showing how impossible it is "to cover one's tracks" after a crime in these days. He prophesied that in the near future, even as the detectograph is now in use, the motion picture would come to be a valuable adjunct in the detection of criminals. He also outlined the story, of which most are familiar, of the Philadelphia-Lancaster counterfeiting case. It is marvelous how dramatic it is. There must have been little need of inventing incidents for the picture. At the same time it was no small or easy job to cast the scenario to be so effective dramatically as has the author of it.

The picture is a fine example to photoplaywrights of what is dramatic. The suspense is as surely felt in the first moment of it as at its climax, although there is a marked deepening of the interest all through. It opens, showing the high-class criminals at work. Any picture of a crime is in itself dramatic; but here the things that give special quality to our interest is the kind of criminal involved and the class of work he is at. The skill of the men excites admiration. This in turn heightens our respect for the skill of Detective Burns a little more than matching his wits against theirs. Besides, we have the sincerely pictured love story; the affection of the daughter of one criminal for her father, and the cleverly portrayed work of the woman detective on the case. There is nothing conventional in it at all and none of the characters have been plot-ridden. Nearly everything in it adds to its human verisimilitude.

William J. Burns has the central role. Of course, he is an accomplished actor—he is as much a professional as any one in the picture. His facial expression gave one of its best touches of humor and made the only loud ripple of laughter at the first performance. And all through he shows not only excellent ability to act; but to act naturally before a camera. Jean Acker's work in the role of Helen, daughter of Long, one of the criminals, gives by its simplicity a strong heart-interest to the whole that tells mightily. There is also a marked touch of personality given to the role of the woman detective by Georgia O'Ramie. She makes the young woman just charming and keeps the most nearly conventional character in the picture absolutely free from triteness. Frank Carrington's Myers, the revenue man, will be noticed though he appears but for a moment. Charles Graham makes his Long, the counterfeiter, a strong attractive man. Nor should we fail to mention Glen White's portrayal of Walton, one of the operators assisting Burns. But every one in the cast deserves commendation. Bertram Harrison produced the picture with the help of Clifford T. Saum and William H. Cavannough. The author of the scenario is George G. Nathan. Surely these have done good work. Photographically, it is all that could be asked.

A TIMELY THEME.

The Great Northern Film Company's production, "Lay Down Your Arms," an adaptation of the famous war novel by the late Baroness Bertha Von Suttner, happens to be most timely, now that Europe is in the throes of a great war. The locale of the story is in Austria and Germany, principally, and former Austrian and German wars are depicted. The fact that these two nations are participating in the present conflict makes this picture exceedingly interesting just now.

The photoplay, which was completed just before the European war began, is not calculated to arouse the patriotism of its audience, but on the contrary, it tends to make one abhor war, by vividly picturing the manifold horrors that the call to arms brings upon a nation. The film drama, therefore, like the novel on which it is based, is a powerful plea for universal peace.

Great care and expense were entailed in making this elaborate production, which enlisted the services of many hundred people. It abounds in spectacular battle scenes, which were enacted on a scale of massiveness that has never been equaled. Great armies of soldiers, engaged in fierce conflict; troops of charging cavalry; artillery in action, and shells bursting in air, are shown with such remarkable realism, that one imagines he hears the roar of cannon and musket.

MISS FELICE FEARS FOR KINSMEN.

Carlotta de Felice, late of the Vitagraph Co., now leading woman with the United Keanograph Film Company, of Fairfax, California, has a source of worry in the European war. All her kinsfolk on her mother's side are French and she now has two uncles and three cousins in the French army, three of whom hold rank. She received word shortly before the opening of hostilities that Henri, her mother's youngest brother, major in one of the French border regiments, had been ordered with his regiment to stand ready to repel German attack near Luxemburg, the neutral territory which Germany saw fit to invade. She greatly fears that this kinsman has been among the fallen. One of Miss de Felice's aunts is a member of the French branch of the Red Cross Society.

Kalem Finds Business Excellent

The Last Week of July the Best the Company Has Had in Its History.

IN the last week of July the Kalem Company reached its high-water mark for sales in the United States. "Talk about the moving picture business having reached its apex," said William Wright, vice-president of the Kalem Company, to a World man last week, "Why, I don't find any apex. Do you know that in American sales alone the final week of July was our banner week. We have had to install temporarily nine printing machines in our projection room until we can arrange our quarters here.

"Ever since this concern has been in business," continued Mr. Wright, "every year has shown a steady improvement in the volume of business. When we came into this building we thought we had room a-plenty for five years. We had to increase our space inside of one year. We intended reserving this floor strictly for office purposes, but we have been compelled to devote a lot of it to factory work. The moving picture business is on a legitimate increase, notwithstanding the many new companies that are coming up and going down. The old-line manufacturers are not suffering from competition. The proof of this is in the business we and other firms are doing right now when according to all precedents this is normally the dull season of the year. We have always heretofore noted decreased business in summer.

Helen Holmes, New Kalem Star.

"Talking last week with George Spoor of the Essanay, he told me that his company is selling more prints than at any time since it has been in business. Putting two and two together it is easily seen that the immense competition anticipated has not decreased the demand for licensed pictures.

"How about the longer subjects? Well, Europe has, or at least it had before the war broke, shut down pretty thoroughly on everything above three reels except, of course, in the case of such productions as 'Cabiria.' The Kalem Company has started out to obtain through our staff writers good, strong one-reel stories. We have found a big demand all over the world for railroad subjects. You know we have made many of these and they have been very successful. We have built up something of an organization on this specialty. Our Producer McGowan has arranged with the Southern Pacific for the making of a new series of railroad stuff. The Southern has permitted him to erect a stage right in the middle of a big yard. This will give us atmosphere in chunks. We are going to show the real thing, to give the public the realism that is absolutely necessary these days.

"We are starting out with a series of one-reel railroad features, which will be under the general title of 'Hazards of Helen.' The interest in each story will lie in the individual subject, although of course it will be greater for those who see them all. Helen Holmes will be featured in these pictures. That is, she will be the central character. In order to get subjects that will pass the critical scrutiny of railroad men as well as others we have formed a combination of a railroad man and a talented script writer. Edward W. Matlack is the former, a train dispatcher with ideas. Frank Howard Clark is collaborating with Mr. Matlack, who has written lots of stuff for us, and who is especially strong in the conception of dramatic situations. Naturally all the stories coming from Mr. Matlack are absolutely correct from a technical railroad standpoint. Mr. McGowan is keeping in touch with both men. These subjects will be released every Saturday.

"We are also organizing another comedy company, so that beginning October we intend to put out comedies every Tuesday and Friday."

Frank C. Bangs

FRANK C. BANGS, the well-known photographer, formerly of San Francisco, and during the past few years one of the foremost artists in New York City, will be the managing director of the newly formed Bangs Laboratories, Inc. The business will be housed in a four-story building located at 69-71 West 90th street, occupying a plot 100 by 55 feet. The laboratories include the most complete mechanical and chemical equipment ever conceived for the handling of motion picture film. The capacity is one and one-half million feet weekly and the business will be in operation in September.

Frank C. Bangs.

Mr. Bangs will be the active head of the developing and printing departments and his achievements in the world of photography argues well for an improved standard in these lines of work. Certain it is that artistry and intelligence will be combined and used in enhancing the quality of all negative handled by the new company. The chemical departments are prepared to undertake any sort of experimental motion photography and to give the highest grade products of the camera. It is a business for which artistic results only may be expected.

The Bangs Laboratories, Inc., will arrange with any producing concern, whereby they will receive, develop and prepare negatives, then make prints, properly toned and tinted and when finished, represent the climax of photograpic achievement applied knowingly to motion pictures.

RAMO MAKES OFFICE CHANGES.

The managers of the offices of Ramo Films, Inc., assembled in New York on Sunday, Monday and Tuesday of last week to discuss the general film situation and lay out a campaign for the handling of the big war picture series being placed on the market now by the company. Several changes have been made, among which are as follows: Joseph F. Lee has been appointed special traveling representative and will devote the majority of his time in the larger bookings of "The War of Wars." C. A. Maddux of Kansas City, and William Conn of Minneapolis, were dropped from the payroll. Frank W. Foster was returned to the Montreal offices, and John S. Egan was placed in charge of the entire Canadian business with headquarters at 11 Richmond Street West, Toronto, Ont. Mr. Hall was retained as district manager of the Minneapolis, Des Moines and Kansas City offices with headquarters in the Utica Building, Des Moines, Iowa. J. E. Conliff succeeded Mr. Lee at the Atlanta offices. Two new managers will be appointed for the Minneapolis and Kansas City offices. All returned to their offices very much pleased with their trip, some increase in salaries and all enthusiastic on the Ramo big production entitled "The War of Wars."

COPYRIGHT OF TITLE COMPELS CHANGE.

On account of the copyright of the title of the Wednesday, August 5, Nestor, that subject will be changed from "For Old Times' Sake" to "For Friendship's Sake." The Universal release of August 25, has been changed from "Universal Ike, Jr.'s Fortune," to "Universal Ike at the Dance of Little L. O."

"The Better Man"

William Courtleigh Featured by Famous Players in a Four-Part Story of Church and Labor.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THE Famous Players released on August 10 "The Better Man," a four-part story by the Rev. Dr. Cyrus Townsend Brady. It is a tale of today, and for a theme it takes the church and labor. Certainly Dr. Brady can speak of church matters with authority, and we see that he can do so with broad sympathy for those who have a limited amount of worldly goods. In his treatment of labor matters Dr. Brady had taken the side of men who work long hours for scant pay and brought out in strong contrast the attitude of the employer whose heart is in the right place except in his dealings with his humbler employes.

Scene from "The Better Man" (Famous Players).

William Courtleigh has the role of the Rev. Mark Stebbing, a minister who in his choice of a pastorate naturally selects one that is among the poor. He feels that in these surroundings he can the better make his work count. He is a leader as well as a pastor. His claim to the former title is established by the manner in which he commands the respect and obedience of striking workmen. Arthur

Scene from "The Better Man" (Famous Players).

Hoopes portrays the Rev. Lionel Barmore, a friend and coworker of Stebbing, in love with the same young woman; but Hoopes has ambitions in directions that are opposite to those of Stebbing's. When you are told that at the disposition of the bishop there are two pastorates, one of wealth and the other with less than nothing, and that the chief parishioner is not only the father of the young woman in question, but also the employer of many of the workers of the latter parish, you have the whole story.

Morgan Thorpe, as the bishop, gives a splendid performance. Robert Broderick has the role of General Wharton, the employer and also the father of Margaret, portrayed by Alice Claire Elliott. Mr. Broderick is convincing as a type of the successful business man who hesitates not to employ in his daily affairs the agencies of the church as well as of politics. He pulls wires that his prospective son-in-law may succeed the late bishop, and to his request of the governor for troops to surround his property he receives complaisant acquiescence without an apparent thought as to legal necessity.

"The Better Man" is a picture that will have appeal according to the natural sympathies of the observer—even more so than is usually the case. It is a story of extremes of life; these are shown in the beginning of the story and striking contrasts recur throughout. The subject will unquestionably be popular from a labor union viewpoint, if we except the suggested employment of dynamite as a means of revenge on Wharton. Such things have happened, but taking it by and large with great infrequency. This phase of the story will be more than offset by the misfortunes that befall the strikebreakers and the revelation of their character.

In staging the interiors of fashionable St. Hilda's Church and humble St. Osmund's Director Powers has had the advice of Dr. Brady. The same is true of the residence of the bishop and the rival pastors. Plainly, great care has been given to this angle of the picture. The "mob" scenes are well handled—whether of the throngs on the great East Side or of the striking workmen or the military.

Vitagraph Theater Changes Bill

With "The Painted World" and "A Florida Enchantment" It Has Strong Program.

THE Vitagraph Theater changed its program on Monday, August 10. The newest Broadway Star Features are "The Painted World," a three-part drama touching on stage life, and "A Florida Enchantment," a farcical fantasy in five parts. The former is from the pen of Jacques Futrelle, the writer who lost his life in the sinking of the Titanic. The script was written by Marguerite Bertsch. It was produced by Ralph Ince. "A Florida Enchantment" is by the late Archibald Clavering Gunter. The screen version is by Eugene Mullen. Sidney Drew is the producer.

It was a silent house that watched the unfolding of "The Painted World." It is a tragedy, gruesome in its realism, but compelling in dramatic force. Julia Swayne Gordon has one of the strongest parts of her long screen career, and it may be added she has never done better work. As Eloise Murree, an actress, she holds the sympathy in spite of her manner of life; holds it on account of the mother love she bears her daughter and of her attempts to protect the child growing to young womanhood from the influences of the stage. Harry Northrup as the dissolute actor gives a powerful performance. His characterization is the antithesis of the polished scoundrel Lord Robert Ure in "The Christian;" it is revelatory of this fine actor's versatility. Anita Stewart is Yvette Murree, daughter of the two. It is a most difficult part of a player young in years and worldly experience. Miss Stewart is effective in her portrayal, especially as the schoolgirl.

"A Florida Enchantment" provided a relief from the tragedy which if it would be unfair to describe as welcome certainly was a most happy one. It is light and gay throughout. It breathes the spirit of comedy. At the head of a splendid cast were Sidney Drew, Edith Storey and Charles Kent.

A novelty enjoyed by the assemblage on the opening night was a view on the screen of the stage over which the picture was being shown. The alternating views of a theater audience were of persons sitting in the same seats as were occupied by the Vitagraph first-nighters. The scenes were of a burlesque show in "The Painted World" and of the audience watching the dancing of the chorus and the antics of the buffoons, with the familiar "Window of the World" as a backdrop.

WARE—GIBBINS.

Mr. and Mrs. James M. Gibbins announce the marriage of their daughter, Eula Fay, to Mr. Lloyd Lecestor Ware, of Lawrence, Kan., Wednesday, July 29. Mr. and Mrs. Ware have left for a motor trip through Colorado and will be at home after September 1, Lawrence, Kan.

"Kaiser William II."

Kaiser Film Company Offers an Intimate Picture of German Emperor—The Offering of the Hour.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THIS one-reel offering (it is a bit under a thousand feet) gives new and delightfully intimate glimpses of the German Kaiser, his family and his army. The offering is truly what it claims to be. It gives no actual scenes of battle field; but it shows the great War Lord at the head of his troops during recent manoeuvers. We see him just as he will stand in the coming struggle watching the field of action and sending members of his staff now with a message to one general and now to another. There are clouds of mist from the quick-firing rifles to be seen, and the galloping of horses. The camera swings to where hastily thrown-up trenches serve as a cover behind which some of those new rapid fire field guns come into action just as they will or are now doing in Alsace, in Luxemburg and in Belgium, to say nothing of the fields to the eastward where Tuton and Slav are facing each other in a death struggle. There are picnic parties in sight also, out with their baskets of luncheon to see what exciting things the great sham battle will unfold. It is all quite peaceful; but at the same time it is real and, leaving out the holiday crowds, the same as is now going on on many a field where death and destruction are busy.

One especially instructive series of scenes shows the German soldiers of the sapper corp of engineers throwing a pontoon bridge across a river just as, perhaps, the very same men have recently done when the first three army corps of the imperial forces crossed the Meuse River in Belgium. We see the whole operation and then watch the infantry come marching, four deep, over as on dry land. Another picture that, in its vividness, will stand out in the memory of all who see the film, is a glimpse of the war leader standing with a map of the field, it may be, studying the movement of his troops and working out the strategetic problem of attack and defense. This was taken not so long ago. If we had been there we would not have been able to read the Kaiser's thoughts. But we know much more now than even he did at that time. If we had been there and knew what we know, we would have studied that face. His is a face to study. There are some close and excellent views of him.

Of course the camera man who took the film knew nothing about the coming war. His object was to show typical scenes of the Kaiser and his family. There are, for instance, some most commendable views of the Kaiser's only daughter, who has just married the Duke of Cumberland. She and her husband are the center of several scenes. The backgrounds of these are some of the grand palaces of the empire, the names of which are not given. Another group shows the Kaiser at Koenigsberg—it is the old family home of the Hohenzollerns—and the occasion is the two hundredth anniversary of their coming to the city. Arches, gateways, parades of soldiers and the flapping of banners, these form a good part of the Kaiser's public life and have a proportionate place in the picture. But the truly great thing about the offering is that, just at this time when the eyes of all the world are watching the drama in which that great war hero has the leading role, and which is to decide his fate, it keeps the very face of the man before us. We cannot only hear the tremendous lines that are being spoken by the decisive guns on land and sea; but we can also watch the actor in his part. Here he acts his role and all the while the newsboys on the street shriek out the fates that still keep us in suspense until we know whether he is to be cast down or lifted to heights as yet hardly dreamed of in all the terrible history of warlike human kind.

The photography is perfect and the print that we saw is clear and fresh. It is an offering among offerings at this time before the actual pictures of the fighting come or pictures that may show him in Paris, even in London. We commend it heartily.

Mme. Sarah Adler

THE world-wide famous emotional actress, Madame Sarah Adler, is the wife of the famous Yiddish Tragedian Jacob P. Adler, and is known throughout the world as the greatest realistic emotional actress on the Yiddish stage. Her first appearance was as a dramatic prima donna, on the operatic stage. In Odessa, Russia, she first appeared as the prima donna, in the Gypsy Baron, Fogelhandler, Bluebird, and in Anton Rubenstein's famous opera, The Demon. It was then, when Jacob P. Adler discovered in her the great gifted talent for the dramatic art, and he fell in love with her.

Mme. Sarah Adler.

In 1890, Madam Sarah Adler came to America, and her first appearance in this country was in the part of Amelia, in the Robbers by Schiller, in which part she created a sensational success. Later the lamented Jacob Gordon discovering the powerful dramatic genius in her, wrote specially for her, his famous plays, Homeless, The True Power, The Stranger, and also translated for her Nora by Ibsen, and also Sapho by Daudet.

Madam Adler was the first who created the original character of Katusha Maslova, in Count Leo Tolstoi's Resurrection. She also created from the same author, the famous character of Okolina, in the play of The Power of Darkness. Her repertoire today consists of 300 plays in which she took the leading parts.

Madam Adler's first experience on the screen, is in the great role as Laura in "Sins of the Parents," and proves that the screen offers no difficulties of expression to a great artist. Her manager, Mr. Ivan Abramson, who knows her capability and artistic value, has specially written the scenario of "Sins of the Parents," and made a powerful realistic drama, based on a big theme full of gripping situations and dramatic climaxes, with the view that the great role of Laura Henderson will be played by Madam Adler.

NEW STUDIO FOR ALL-STAR.

With the expiration of the present lease on the studio at Yonkers, New York, which the All-Star Feature Corporation have been occupying for many months past, it is announced that their new studio at Fort Lee will be taken over by the company on or about August 15th and that beginning with the interior sets for "Shore Acres" and the production of "The World" in which William Faversham is to star and make his initial appearance in motion pictures, the All-Star Feature Corporation will become installed in the beautiful new plant which has been under construction for the past four months.

PENNSYLVANIA CENSORSHIP LAW SUSTAINED.

Judge Martin in the Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia, Pa., handed down a decision on Thursday, August 6, in the case of the Mutual Film Corporation and others who sought to restrain the Pennsylvania censor, J. Louis Breitinger, from enforcing the act establishing a censorship over motion pictures in that state. In passing upon the question of the validity of the law Judge Martin held that the act was constitutional and not an illegal interference with interstate commerce; also, that the State had power to exercise authority over motion pictures. It is understood that the case will be appealed.

Doings at Los Angeles

THE Jessie L. Lasky studio in Hollywood is preparing to start work shortly on David Belasco's "The Rose of the Rancho," which will be followed later by "The Girl of the Golden West." The company intends making these two films around the real old missions in California, with all the spirit and realistic atmosphere as it was in the years gone by. The studio is being enlarged and new buildings erected to be used in the making of films.

Up at the Frontier camp Willis L. Robards has just finished "Under Arizona Skies," a drama of the west. In one part the white men's shack has to be burned by Indians. The shack is burned all right, but the grass and bushes near catch fire and as a result the whole company was forced to fight the fire. The work was so strenuous, and the fire so hard to extinguish, that several fighters fainted. It took two hours' hard work to keep the flames from going to the hills, which would have started a great forest fire.

Another film favorite has fallen for the gasoline wanderlust. Miss Leona Hutton, who plays leads in many New York Film Company's pictures, has purchased a "car" to run from the Broncho camp in the canyon to Santa Monica. It is a Ford, but goes up the roads just the same.

In directing "For the Last Edition," a newspaper drama, Fred A. Kelsey had a crowd of "newsies" working in front of one of the dailies here and in the struggle for papers, one of the lads suffered a broken arm. The picture was stopped and Kelsey rushed the boy to the hospital in his car. En route he lost his trunk from the rear of the machine and had a chase after it, but returned in time to shoot the big scenes.

Albert W. Hale, directing the funny Kalem pictures at the beach, recently used a motorcycle cop and a real judge in one of the scenes. Judge J. J. Carrillo of the police court presided and married three couples who were caught by Motorcycle Mike Suttie of the police force. The judge read the real lines, and the couples are really married, only they had no real license. If it had been in Scotland, some one said, the couples would really have been married. The next picture will be a great big feature comedy with John Brennan and Betty Teare as the leading players.

He threw her with such force that the lounge on which she lit collapsed and the poor heavy man thought that he had killed the dainty star, but she was very much alive and was only slightly bumped. Anne Schaefer threw a heavy chair at the heavy, and broke the chair on a table. Pieces flew in every direction and one man suffered a scratched hand. The Vitagraph has not put on such a lively piece in some months. Ulysses Davis directed this picture as well as the first one. He is turning out some good work, and starts next week on another new one.

CLARKE IRVINE.

Estha Williams

WHEN the Select Photo-Play Producing Company arranged with Arthur C. Aiston for "At the Old Cross Roads" it was specifically stipulated in the contract that Estha Williams should be seen in the role of "Parepa" which she created and played with such success during eight of the fourteen seasons' tours. Miss Williams' connection with the picture play will add materially to its value from one end of the country to the other, for she will everywhere be recognized as the popular original of the role.

Estha Williams.

Gaining her first stage experience when a girl in the California Theater San Francisco Stock Co., she was brought East by Edward Harrigan, going from his company to play ingenue leads with Maude Granger and Jeffreys Lewis. She was then seen in "Tennessee's Pardner," in which she made one of her biggest hits, going from that play to "At the Old Cross Roads." Since leaving the latter play, Miss Williams has been seen in "Shadows on the Hearth," "As the Sun Went Down" and the past two seasons has been starred in "A Man's Game," one of Owen Davis' latest and best plays.

Miss Williams is not only one of our most magnetic actresses, but is a brilliant stage Directress as well, having not only played the Star Role in "Tennessee's Pardner," "At the Old Cross Roads," "Shadows on the Hearth," "As the Sun Went Down" and "A Man's Game," but in addition directed the staging of all of them.

The filming of the play is under the entire charge and supervision of the well-known Director, Frank Dear, who already has several successes to his credit.

Choosing the Location

Success of a Picture Theater Depends Largely Upon Building in the Right Place.

By G. B. Crain, Jr.

POSSESSION is nine points of the law, according to legal authorities; and location is nine points of success in the moving picture business. Experience has shown that the exhibitor who is preparing to start afresh in the field or to add additional houses must analyze every feature of his prospective location if he wishes to avoid the pitfalls that are spread for him.

Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been lost by selecting the wrong location, just as hundreds of thousands have been made by getting the right one. Most of the losses could have been avoided if the factors contributing to the situation had been sufficiently examined.

In the first place, it is up to the exhibitor to follow "the line of least resistance" as to the crowds. He may possibly create such an attractive theater, and win such a strong hold on his public as to draw spectators out of the beaten paths; but this is an obvious handicap, especially taking into account present or potential competition. Just as a retail store in an out-of-the-way place fails for want of patronage when another, no better in any of the essentials, succeeds hugely by virtue of being in the way of the traffic, so a theater's success or failure is determined largely by whether or not it has the right position.

It is false economy to look for a "cheap" location. Of course, the quality of the crowds varies, and the exhibitor has the choice of what sort he will cater to. The high-grade clientele of the fashionable shopping center will patronize one kind of show, while the middle classes looking for bargains in the "popular-priced" stores will be pleased, probably, with an entirely different moving picture offering. The suburban stand is another proposition, all by itself. But the vital matter of numbers remains the same in all of them.

In a large southern city a big moving picture theater, which was erected at a cost of $60,000, now stands idle. The doors are closed, and the chances are that it will never be opened again. The owner of that theater is now operating another, in the heart of the city. A friend asked him to tell how it happened.

"Well," he confessed, "I'll have to admit that I made a colossal mistake, that's all.

"When I hit this town, I saw right away it could take care of a big, high-grade house. Real estate values on the main street seemed out of proportion, however, and I figured that with the right kind of house I could pull them my way. So I got the location I thought would do, as it was only a block away from the main thoroughfare, and put up the best house I could. The papers gave us plenty of publicity, and it looked like we couldn't fail. But somehow the people didn't seem to come. Then this other chap came along, got this site, put up a new house, and began making money hand over fist. I paid him $25,000 for his lease.

"Hereafter I'm not going to speculate on a poor location. I'd rather pay twice as much for a site that I know is good than to have to worry with the initial handicap of a poor one."

In a great many cities there is only one "good" street. This is a survival of the "Main street" idea of the country town, but in many communities of over a quarter of a million people there is but one retail thoroughfare that amounts to anything. All of the logic of the situation seems to point to some other street that looks equally good. The side streets which intersect the main artery look good, and it seems a simple matter to divert the traffic a few steps from the busy thoroughfare to the theater on a cross street; but, as suggested, experience has indicated that it can't be put over without a lot of hard work.

Not only is there the proposition of getting on the right street, but the right side of the street is equally important. In an Ohio valley city of considerable importance an exhibitor went on the north side of one of the principal streets, failed miserably, and was apparently convinced that he had made a mistake in getting into the business. He refused to be discouraged, got a few thousands together, and started another show on the opposite side of the street. He's making lots of money, and has started two other shows—all on the south side of the same street where he lost his first stake.

"That old sunny side cooked my goose," he exclaimed jocularly, not long ago. "People simply won't cross to that side of the street, but they just flow by in rivers on the south side. I thought I'd do just as well over there and save $100 a month rent; but the thirty yards between north and south side made all the difference between bankruptcy and prosperity for yours truly."

The suburban theater is probably the most interesting development of recent years. In most of the big cities the downtown sections have been pretty thickly sprinkled with picture shows, and though the capacity of the public for supporting enterprises of this kind seems to be almost unlimited, it is becoming harder and harder to locate a theater in the central districts with assurances of making a go of it.

On the other hand there are thriving suburbs in all of the larger cities which are almost clamoring for picture shows. They have demonstrated time without number their ability to provide the necessary volume of patronage, and to keep the theaters going constantly, and not merely a few nights a week, as in some of the country towns where the patronage is limited. The selection of the suburban location, then, affords opportunity and creates responsibility, for it means taking advantage of favorable conditions and dodging unfavorable ones.

In the suburb it is necessary to follow the crowds to an even greater degree than elsewhere. Usually there is a "focal point" in the district, such as street-car intersections or the spot where the principal drug-stores, groceries, etc., are located. People come there to buy the necessities of life, and to take the cars for the downtown district. The traffic stream is flowing that way. Don't try to divert it; get in the middle of it, and take advantage of all that it offers.

An exhibitor who has established not less than a dozen theaters, and has "hit the bull's eye" in all of them, put the proposition interestingly, if somewhat crudely, when he said:

"Find out where the people loaf, and go there. The loafing district is the place where the amusement man can't help succeeding. People who have idle hours to dispose of are the ones whose money comes most easily. You can get more transient trade, and get it more easily, by picking the loafing centers than in any other way."

In this connection the drug-store in the suburb, if it is at the traffic center, is usually a gathering-place for the young men of the locality, and makes a good neighbor for the moving picture show. This applies also to the country town exhibitor, whose problem is largely the same as that of the suburban owner.

The kind and class of people in the suburb make vital conditions which must be studied by the exhibitor. Children are to be found nearly everywhere; and yet the presence of a large number of young people of the "social age," from fifteen to twenty, is a big asset. New subdivisions where the population consists largely of young married couples make good locations, because as a rule the newlyweds are trying to save money to pay for a home, and consequently prefer cheap amusement. They can go to the movies for the carfare that would be needed to take them downtown; and consequently they are almost certain patrons for the picture theater, even though they are studiously economizing in the larger expenditures which offer themselves.

What looked, on the surface, to be a fine location for a theater turned out to be a big disappointment, just because the owner hadn't analyzed his conditions sufficiently. The district was in a neighborhood where many factories were located, and the population was made up chiefly of mechanics and their families. They made comfortable incomes, and many of them, it appeared, owned their own homes. Here was a thickly populated, prosperous, little suburb, which apparently was "made to order" for a theatre.

Nevertheless, the house was a flat failure. It hardly ever took in enough to pay expenses, and Saturday night and Sunday were about the only days when business was anything like it had been expected to be. The show was finally closed up and the exhibitor went elsewhere.

"What was the trouble?" repeated the owner when the reason was inquired. "Too many to tell all at once. In the first place, most of the people seemed to be middle-aged, or at any rate past their first youth, and didn't care much for amusement. Staying up late was a form of dissipation they didn't want to indulge in. If I were to wait for the next generation to come along I might succeed there, but at present it isn't any too promising.

"The factories worked long hours, I found. Their people went to work at 6.30 in the morning, and didn't leave until 6 at night. The employes were tired out when they got home, and beat it for bed after supper, except on Saturday and Sunday.

"Then, too, I learned there was a big proportion of foreign-born people, who were so thrifty that they didn't want to spend a cent unnecessarily. It takes Americans, as a rule, to support a theater properly, and these foreigners were too busy saving to come to the theater. It took me six months to find all this out, but I think the experience has been worth while. Hereafter I'm going to know everything there is to know about a locality before I jump in."

The considerations which apply to the suburb may be varied only slightly to meet conditions in the small town, where in many cases enough business must be done a few nights a week to support the entire proposition. The kind of roads connecting the town with the outlying countryside make a big diffrence in conditions, and the class and prosperity of the farmers, of course, affect things. With a steady business from the rural districts round about, and a good local trade to draw on, the picture house in the country town is assured of good business.

Locality affects the theater first, last and all the time; and consequently nobody entering the business should decide that question finally without looking into every feature of the situation and analyzing it from every standpoint.

George A. Lessey

GEORGE LESSEY, one of the most progressive and brilliant dramatic photoplay directors of the day, has signed with the Universal to direct Imp features with King Baggot in the leads. Mr. Lessey has been an Edison director for the past two years, and during that time he has attracted wide-spread attention by his market to handle strong dramatic stories; with the "Cleek" detective series, produced in collaboration with "Short Stories" he placed himself among the "top-notchers."

George A. Lessey.

Mr. Lessey though still in his early thirties, has achieved his success through long and practical experience. Starting at the time when he was a boy, playing leads in the amateur theatricals of Amherst, his home town, Mr. Lessey has faced the footlights under every condition common to the profession, has enacted every kind of part. His parents were not theatrical people, but his first professional part on the road as Horatio in "Hamlet" when he was still a boy, kindled the spark that, burning always higher, disclosed gradually the real genius.

He is a furious worker, though the speed characteristic of him is always balanced with care and attention to detail. During the first year that he was a director he produced fifty thousand feet of negative, every foot of which was released and proved successful.

FAMOUS PLAYERS ENGAGE BLANCHE WALSH.

The Famous Players Film Company has engaged Blanche Walsh, to be presented in a forthcoming release in her foremost dramatic triumph, "The Straight Road," one of the most popular plays from the pen of the great Dramatist Clyde Fitch.

"The Straight Road" and "The Woman in the Case" are conceded the most prominent of this actress' many successes, and of the two the former is more popular because of its deeper and more general appeal. "The Straight Road" portrays the gallant fight of a strong woman against evil and her final valiant victory over the enemies that seek to destroy her soul. The struggle is physical and emotional as well as psychological, and the suspense of interest holds till the very climax of the great conflict.

The character of Mary O'Hara, the girl of the slums, so wonderfully impersonated by Blanche Walsh in the original stage production, will also be played by her in the Famous Players film dramatization of the subject and permits of ideal screen depiction.

Baby Garrity

TO the category of not only competent but pretty screen baby stars may be added Marie Garrity, who has appeared in a number of Essanay productions. She is as pretty as the accompanying photograph shows her, and is a charming baby actress. It would seem that Baby Garrity is possessed of all the requisites that fit one for the screens. She is a good photographic subject by reason of her rather dark hair, brown eyes, dark eyebrows, prettily shaped face and nice features, while her work indicates that she is endowed with that power of conveying emotional struggles by facial expression and gestures rather than by word of mouth. She is a versatile youngster.

Baby Garrity.

According to the mother of the little girl, Marie was approached, as she was playing in one of the streets in Chicago, her home town, by one of the directors of the Essanay Film Mfg. Company who could see the good screen qualities in her. She was given a trial and has proved herself to be a competent child actress beyond expectations. This little creature had also been in demand for posing before her moving picture experience, and those who have seen the juvenile September Morn picture which was published in Chicago will recognize in the subject Sweet Marie. She has also posed as Cupid for artists, due to her charming personality.

And yet Baby Garrity is only a little past her fourth birthday.

FILM COMMITTEE RE-ELECTED.

At the third informal conference of moving picture advertising specialists and manufacturers, which was held at the Hotel Claridge, New York City, July 29th and 30th, the following members of the National Committee, who were appointed at the Chicago meeting held at La Salle Hotel in January, were unanimously re-elected: Watterson R. Rothacker of the Industrial Moving Picture Co., Charles Stark of the Essanay Film Mfg. Co., and J. Alexander Leggett of the Pathescope Company.

The conference was replete with interesting features. The first day was devoted to a discussion with representatives of various advertising agents on the relation of the advertising agency to the moving picture advertising manufacturer.

The second day's program was as follows: "The Truth About Moving Picture Advertising," by Mr. Rothacker; "Moving Picture Circulation," by Mr. Stark; "Miniature Projecting Machines," by Mr. Leggett; "Municipal Motography," by W. E. Hamilton; "The Ad Film in Selling," by N. F. Sawyer, and "Moving Picture Advertising Achievement," by H. J. Aldous.

Several members of Panama Commissions were unofficially present and told of the big part moving pictures will play at the impending San Francisco Exposition. It was tentatively decided to have the next meeting of the National Committee at San Francisco in February, 1915, although it is probable that a special meeting will be called for either Chicago or New York in August.

MORE INFRINGEMENT SUITS.

The Motion Picture Patents Company commenced several suits during the past week in the United States District Court against a number of film manufacturing concerns to secure damages and injunctive relief alleging that the defendants have infringed on the Edison reissue patents controlled by the complainant.

The defedants named in the suits are the All Star Feature Corporation, the Ramo Films, Inc., the Ryno Film Company, the Victor Motion Picture Manufacturing Company and the Life-Photo Film Corporation.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

YES, was IS hell. If you do not believe it mingle with the photoplayers at their several rendezvous and ask them what they think of the European war. Although the cannons have been booming but a few days their effect has been most painfully felt in many quarters of this country, and notably in the motion picture centers. Every domestic company which had any foreign trade has adopted a policy of retrenchment and today many photoplayers who have been chiding their fellow stage players for not getting into the "picture game" are strolling along the White Way, waiting for something to turn up. The developments of the past week have been surprises to many. Few outside of those directly connected with the executive branches of domestic photoplay producers realized the importance of the foreign trade in the operations of the companies.

Some optimists ridicule the statements that the American end of the film industry has been hard hit by the war. They contend that wherever there has been a war the theaters have done record business and film producers who now claim they suffer from the European crisis are influenced by the same motives that govern the producers of such commodities as beef, flour, wheat, corn, coal and clothing. Such views are absurd. The conditions in the motion picture field and those existing in the field of such necessities as have been referred to are foreign to each other in the most extended sense. Take the conditions in this country, for instance. If photoplay producers say that, through losses of foreign trade, they are obliged to raise the prices of their products they are met by the retort of the exhibitor that they cannot raise their admission prices. The theory that people will forego almost everything for amusement has its limit. The people must live, and they cannot eat motion pictures.

* * *

Taking the foreign aspect of the situation we find from those who know that companies operating in this country and having a big foreign business reap a greater profit from that business than they do from the home trade. "Oh," said a wise man a few days ago, "this whole thing is only a war scare to the timid. As soon as one side or the other gets control of the seas the film men will have an open route to the London and Paris markets, and they are the chief centers of the export trade." Very good. But how are the theaters on land to be supplied? France, Germany, Russia, Austria, Hungary, and Belgium, all important factors in the export trade, are being invaded by the enemy and commerce is at a standstill in all. those countries. Every motion picture plant in Paris is shut down. To whom is the American manufacturer to consign his shipments, and how much is he to ship? Unlike many commodities, motion pictures are not good until used and the makers of them cannot afford to make exportations on a chance of arrival. There is not a man in the business who would take a chance today and make shipment of films to Russia. They might get to some part of Russia, but in time of a war such as the present one there would not be the remotest possibility of securing adequate distribution of the consignment. Many people do not know that Russia is one of the most important countries in film exportations from this side. Mr. Nicholas Power, of the Nicholas Power Company, upon returning from his last European tour, stated that American made films predominated in Russia. The loss of this market alone is a severe one.

Anyone who tries to discount the claims that American producers of motion picture films having an export trade have been hit hard by the European war does not know what he is talking about. For reasons already given such manufacturers could not profit by falsely making such claims. The only producers who have not suffered are those who make no exportations and have no foreign plants. These are companies who depend solely upon the markets of this country and who remain in the field as competitors of those who have losses to bear.

* * *

One of the most prominent men in the domestic field expresses the opinion that nothing short of peace in Europe will bring back foreign business to the motion picture producers in this country. The resumption of shipping facilities will not relieve the situation. While war continues no one can hope to get the films to the exhibitor. He also expressed the opinion that if the war continues much longer most of the American manufacturers will discontinue big feature productions and go back to the one and two reelers until the people on the other side stop fighting. His reason for entertaining this opinion is that the American market alone will not justify some of the home companies in continuing the expense and labor big features entail. "I have looked the situation over very carefully," he said, "and I find the motion picture industry was never in a more uncertain condition than it is today. I look for some companies to suspend business altogether if the war continues more than ninety days. The United States has thousands of picture theatres, but the number of producers far exceeds in proportion, and I cannot see how some of them will be able to survive the competition in the restricted territory. But there is a good time coming for those who can weather the storm. The survival of the fittest has been repeatedly predicted and I believe a realization of it has been brought nearer by at least a year through the effects of the European war."

* * *

Said a theatrical agency man the other day: "The assumed spirit of patriotism on the part of some people who come to me for stage and photoplay work makes me tired. Day after day they plead for an opportunity to make some money which they may leave their wives and children when their country calls them for service in the war. Some men who come to me are sincere, but the majority use the plea as a ruse to get booked. One fellow told me that his three brothers, who had been the support of his aged parents were called to war and he was obliged to send money from this side to help keep up the support. I made a special effort in his behalf, and felt like kicking myself a few days later when I found out that the fellow was born in this country and of American parentage. His story was a pure fake."

"Another fellow has been stringing me along since the war was first spoken of. He says the consul of his country has told him to be prepared to sail on five days' notice and wants to raise money to leave with his family. His boasted patriotism has made him such a pest to his club associates that I rather enjoyed a twittering one of the members gave him the other night. 'Why don't you remain here?' asked the member. 'I admire your loyalty to your homeland, but your first duty is to look after your family.' The patriot responded that his two first duties were to stand by God and his country. 'I am no coward,' he exclaimed. 'Then why don't you go and fight?' the member continued. 'Why wait for your country to call you?' Again the patriot replied, saying that he wanted to first save up some money to leave with his family, to which the tormenter answered: 'Well, if you do not cut down on those gin rickies you store away every day the war will be over before you get the savings started.'"

* * *

"This war stuff," continued the agent, "gets on my nerves, especially when I hear it used as I have stated, and for cheap advertising. This is especially noticeable in the ranks of the photoplay people. They are just bubbling with patriotism, but I don't see any of them rushing for the steamers that carry recruits to the other side. Less brave talk and more expression and sympathy for the hundreds of thousands of poor wretches who are in the midst of the terrible struggle would be more fitting."

* * *

"I also think," said the agent, "that something should be done to squelch managers of some of the cheap picture houses who placard the fronts of their places with misleading announcements that they already have pictures taken at the front. Such tactics not only hurt legitimate exhibitors who will bona fide pictures, but also takes money from people under false pretenses. Any exhibitor who knowingly makes false advertisement of war pictures that are not bona fide should have his license cancelled. It is inhuman to fake situations behind which there is such an awful sacrifice of life which the present war involves."

THEATER FOR MEMPHIS, TENN.

A one-story building on the west side of Main street, Memphis, Tenn., has been demolished in order to make room for a motion picture theater. When completed the house will become the property of the Majestic Amusement Company. The cost of the theater is estimated at $65,000, and it will be known as the Majestic No. 1. The opening of the new picture house has been set for some time during the Christmas holidays.

Bad Tactics.

LATELY we wandered down in Maine. Almost the first thing we saw was a medicine show set up right on the main street. Most of you know what a medicine show is, a free vaudeville performance with a chap who can make you think you have all fifty-seven varieties of disease and can cure them with one bottle of the stuff he sells. The doctor with this show was not much, but he had an "orator" who was a peach. Along about Friday he lit into the leading picture man of the place with both feet, also his fingernails and voice. The manager had complained that the chap was not complying with the State license law, and had put the show "in bad" at the next stand. He was a politician of the regnant party and could do it, and he did it, he told us, to get square with the man who came in and stole business with a free show. He had the courage of his convictions, for he made the complaint under his own name, but it was a bad job. Here was a man who was giving a free show—and not a bad one as shows go in Maine—and the public was with him. He quickly found the name of the complainant and he "showed him up" in true medicine show style, and for the time the town people were sore on the picture show for sympathy was with the under dog, and they overlooked the fact that the medicine man was taking between eight hundred and a thousand dollars of the town money out of the place for medicine that could not possibly have been worth $100 in material and that was worth far less than that in curative properties. He didn't think of it, either, probably.

All they thought was that the local manager was sore, and they thought it a shame he should jump on a man who gave them a fine show for nothing, and it will take several months for the local man to get back where he was.

All of which is the same as saying that if you get this outside and manifestly unfair competition, it is better to suffer in silence. Do not let people suppose that you are being hurt. There are two good chances. Get the local board of trade busy. If it is a medical show get the State Medical Association busy, but do not appear personally as the single armed champion of the people or you'll get the aforesaid arm jolted.

It all reduces down to the fact that if you seem to be afraid of competition people will believe that you have reason to be afraid. They look at the main point, not at the fact that you have to pay taxes and license fees and the other fellow does not, and it leaves a bad taste in the mouths of possible and actual patrons.

Something Odd.

The Lyric theater seems to have a new scheme. It's program and five cents is accepted for an admission to the Saturday matinee. The programs, which cover the calendar week are given out Monday and Tuesday. This being the case we think it would be well to include Monday and Tuesday of the next week in the list, or else give them out Saturday. This paragraph gives the idea as they announce it:

Keep this Program. This Program and Five Cents will admit any Adult to our Saturday Matinee, May 16th. Save money by attending our Monday and Tuesday night performances as those are the only nights program will be given out.

Wants to Know a Lot.

J. B. Feinberg, of DuBois, Pa., writes that he has not missed a copy of this paper in three years, when he started with a 190 house. Last year he wrote us about his two-cent matinees. He sold the house in May and it is closed at present. Meantime he has an airdome. He writes:

> I have been watching your paper to see something about airdomes, but as yet have seen nothing, so I guess I have the honor of being first in your paper as well as being the first to build an airdome in this part of the country. (L. J. Scott beat him into the paper. There should have been dozens more. E. W. S.) The weather has not yet been an airdome weather, but I do not regret it as I shall win through. As Richardson says, "If you do something it pays to do it right" (unless it's the hind saddle of that gas bike of his, E. W. S. again). You can judge from the picture. My airdome is 70 by 100 and seats about 800. Floor and benches of new yellow pine, ordinary screen with shadow box six feet deep. Oilcloth covers on wings that can be open or closed in a minute. Under shadow box a place for the piano covered with tar paper. I don't want to take up your space describing the rest, but will send photograph and description to anyone interested. Enclosed find circular which I gave out. I got a lot of opinions. It seems to me that most persons like modern plays. I run a program of five reels for five and ten cents, and expect to get fifteen cents for big features, which I will run when the weather settles. Conditions are very slow at present. One of our best houses has cut out features and has gone back to straight stuff for five cents. I feel there will be a lot of small houses closed and some manufacturers will be forced out of an overcrowded business. I can't say much more, but you know the future (if we only did!). I doubt whether half your subscribers read your paper through, but I read it from cover to cover, and it helps me out a lot.

We are sorry Mr. Feinberg has not sent in a photograph of the interior of the airdome. If he will be so good as to have photographs made of his park and the oilcloth screens (particularly the screens) he can have all the space he wants. His offer is generous, but many will like to see it here.

The man who reads this paper "from cover to cover" keeps fully posted. Lots of times managers tell us that they "even read Richardson's department." Why shouldn't they? They have an operator and pay him to keep posted, but the man who does not read and follow closely Mr. Richardson's stuff each week can't tell his operator when he is wrong and make it stick. It's one of the first things we turn to and we learn a lot from it. Surely the managers should know as much as their employees.

The circular Mr. Feinberg refers to covers a lot of ground, but it is useful and drives home his argument. Here it is:

DON'T THROW THIS AWAY

Fill this out and return to J. B. Feinberg, personal, or drop in box in front of Airdome.

When you go into a store to make a purchase, you buy what you want, and if you don't like what you see, you don't take it.

The Moving Picture Theater is different. You pay before entering, and if you don't like it you must take it anyway.

It's going to be different with the

AIRDOME

We are giving you a chance to tell us what you like. Fill out the lines below, mark "yes" or "no." Also remarks in spaces between. Indicate the kind of Pictures you like:

Classical Dramas.....	Railroad Dramas.....
Society Dramas.....	Educational Dramas.....
Modern Dramas.....	Industrial Dramas.....
Historical Dramas.....	Scenic Dramas.....
Indian Dramas.....	Comedy .....
Western Dramas.....

Do you like single or multiple reels?.....State how many?.....Do you like vaudeville?..... Would you pay 20 cents for high class vaudeville?..... Name your favorite photo players and manufacturers..... Would you pay 15 cents for "The Lion and the Mouse," 6 reels?....."The Third Degree," 5 reels?..... "The Wolf," 5 reels?.....and other plays of that class?.....

We have installed Two Modern Machines which will give continuous shows.

Do you want your pictures continuous or a short intermission between subjects?..... Do you object to advertising slides?.....

We will show every night during the summer. How many nights will you come?..... Please give us your candid opinion. Our success depends upon your support.

Our intention is to give the best in the best possible way. Remember you don't need fans.

Fill this out and return as soon as possible.

Some advertising of a sort that kicks was used to mark the opening of the house which, from the front, a photograph of which is reproduced here, does not widely differ from other entrances. But we think that the inside offers novel features. If, as we think, the oilcloth screens are designed to keep the benches dry through summer showers, Mr. Feinberg has done something in discovering a means. This is the advertisement:

READ THIS, KEEP IT, AND REMEMBER THE AIRDOME

> When I bought the Lyric over three years ago, some people gave me only two months to continue in business; instead I outlived all the former owners of that place, combined. I was always looking out for the best. I had to struggle with a small capacity room, but now I assure you you are going to see the best under the best conditions in a big room. I have spared no expense in building the Airdome. I went the limit. My success depends upon your patronage. Make the Airdome a pleasure visit, not a time killer. Hoping you will be with me.

J. B. FEINBERG, Proprietor.

"Make your visit a pleasure, not a time killer," is a mighty good slogan for any house, whether it has a roof or not.

Information Wanted.

H. P. Kress, Princess Theater, Corning, N. Y., asks for the name and address of someone who has run The Country Store. He wants it for "a friend." We hope he advises his friends to keep out of trouble. It may help business a few weeks, but it does not hold up and it cannot be stopped, once it is started. Worse still, it leads to other evils.

Another One.

Jake Schwartz, of the Pearce Theater, Houston, Texas, writes that he is sending his program under separate cover. Will he please repeat. We did not get it. He adds:

As you will notice in the recent issues, we are combining the Pearce and Crystal Theaters, as we have recently acquired the Crystal Theater, in this city.

In a very short time, at the utmost ninety days, we will have still another theater added to our list in Houston.

I am much interested in your weekly pages, for I find some very good material and suggestions offered by brother managers, that aid materially in carrying out some of my ideas as regards publicity promoting.

We issue a "coupon book" good for thirty admissions for $2.50, acceptable at either of our houses, and good for any attraction that we may play in our theaters.

Thursday and Friday of each week are our special feature days, on which days we mostly play Famous Players productions, and our admission price is twenty cents (20c).

In addition to the above we have also issued a "child's coupon book" and find it has proven quite a good thing, as parents have presented their children with these books, which are greatly appreciated, and a more useful, or acceptable present could hardly be given to a child.

I note in a recent issue of the Moving Picture World that a moving picture was made at night in New Orleans, a couple of weeks ago, the first one attempted in the South. I will have to call a halt on Brother Item.

Last October I made a moving picture of an audience leaving a local theater, and used the scene in an advertising film that I made for a local concern.

We have the confidence of our patrons, and when we add a special feature, they know that they will see something good, and properly projected, as our projection is absolutely perfect.

Where the local laws permit children to visit the theater unattended, the coupon book is an almost positive assurance that the child is somewhere where it will not be trying to butt a street car off the track, wreck an automobile or do any of the other things that generally result in disaster for the kiddie. As a safety first proposition a well-conducted theater is one of the best first aids to parents.

A New Form.

A new one is the "Sacramento Movie Weekly," published by the Edison Theater. It differs from the others in the form and arrangement. It is a "six-by-nine" but the nine-inch measurement is the long way of the sheet. Another novelty in its format is that it is composed of two eights bound one on top of the other by staples through the top and not on the edge. We do not know what kind of local mechanical conditions brought this form, but it is not inconvenient and it looks well all except that gosh-blamed Old English type on the heading. When you try to spell Sacramento in Old English it looks even worse than the average. If they won't do it again we'll like them a lot. There does not seem to be much they have overlooked. Page three, the most important page next the title, has the program, which is the most important stuff. Page two is the editorial page and the rest is given to stories of the film, notes of the players and foreign advertising in just about the right proportions. For a volume one, number one, it is just about as close as they will need to get in volume ten, and all we can do is to pass a bouquet to editor C. W. Alexander and modestly remark that we hope we get on the permanent list. In a talk with advertisers they say: "Frankly, we feel that we have a mighty good advertising medium." We'll beat that and say that if the Sacramento advertisers know a good thing and if the sheet is held to the initial standard, they'll have a thirty-two pager within six months and deserve it. Perhaps some others can use this straight talk in starting or building up their own sheet, but first it will be necessary to get out something really readable. Here it is:

A STRAIGHT-FROM-THE-SHOULDER TALK WITH ADVERTISERS.

This is our first issue of the Sacramento Movie Weekly. In offering it to the "movie" fans of this city we believe that we have something that will fill a long felt want. We will print in our publication each week reading matter of interest to them, together with cuts of scenes from plays and of the people who make them. And this information will be so interesting that they will read every word of it; not only the people who receive this magazine at their favorite theater, but every member of the family into whose home it goes.

Frankly, we feel that we have a mighty good advertising medium. It is so good that we are putting all of our time and a great deal of money into making it a success. But it is necessary that we receive support from the merchants of this city in the form of advertising. The Sacramento Movie Weekly has been indorsed as a legitimate advertising medium. It is more than that—it is one of the best advertising mediums you can use to place anything before the people of Sacramento and the surrounding country. We want to show you that an ad placed in it will bring you returns. It is bound to, for in reading this publication it is necessary to read the ads whenever the information about films is read. We know the value of it to you, and we want to prove that every word we tell you is the truth. The easiest way to do this is to try it out for a few insertions. We went you to know that you are getting more than your money's worth before you go into it. If our magazine does not speak for itself, then let our men come around and tell you the rest of the story.

Stretching It.

From Wellington, New Zealand, a correspondent sends a page advertisement of "Judith of Bethulia," being shown June 8th. The correspondent wants to know if the statement made that "this is the first public exhibition of the subject in the world" is correct. It most assuredly is not, and we do not believe that any person was attracted to the theater by this statement. To the contrary, we believe that this sort of talk throws a question of doubt on the entire advertisement, particularly since liberal quotations are made from papers in cities where it has been shown in England, and even without this it stands to reason that so prominent a subject would not be held until it could first be released in New Zealand. As a matter of fact, a majority of the cities and many of the small towns here saw the subject in May and April.

It is foolish to argue that the public likes to be lied to. They do want to be humbugged now and then if the deception is clever, but such an obviously erroneous statement cannot but operate against the house using it.

At the Empress the prices were a shilling, with half-price in the afternoon and some reserved seats in the evening at two shillings.

Permanent Advertising.

Joseph D. Ashby, of the Orpheum-Stanton Airdome, Washington, D. C., sends in a card carrying cuts of Miss Joyce, Miss Fuller and G. M. Anderson. In type are names of the other licensed stars, and above:

Meet Us
In High-Class Motion Pictures
Every Evening.

The first and third lines are in very heavy black type, while the middle line is in a thirty-point letter. Mr. Ashby has had fifty of these cards on heavy enameled stock printed, and displays them in store windows. He wants to know what we think of the idea.

He does not say what the cards cost him, but he did not get the three half-tones printed for the price of block type, and it costs as much to make the press ready for fifty as for five hundred or five thousand, and we imagine that this was no cheap job. We are inclined to think that he might have saved money and gained in effect (supposing that these cards were costly) had he purchased cardboard sheets and had the matter printed on a light card to be attached to the cardboard base along with actual photographs of two or three stars. In this way he could have gained variety and have at the same time gained in effect.

Considered apart from the probable cost, it is a fine piece of printing, both in press work and general arrangement, and the wording is attractive, but we thing it is a question as to whether the money might not have been more advantageously laid out.

Motion picture enterprises seldom can afford costly advertising, and it is well to study prices and results carefully. Photographs may be had for 10 and 20 cents each. They are more convincing than half-tones. In small lots for really high-class work it is probable that they are cheaper.

Hey!!

Koford and Ryan write: "Enclosed find one of our house organs." We wonder if they are kidding us, or if they merely forgot to send one.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Amateur and Professional.

JUST what do you mean when you speak of an amateur? The dictionary gives two broad general definitions, "one who pursues an art for the love of it" and "as opposed to the work of a professional." But in the sense in which most correspondents use it it means a person who writes first class stories but can't sell them. Every now and then and sometimes much more frequently, we get a letter that asks "What chance has the amateur against the professional?" That seems to worry these self styled amateurs much more than anything else, but there are a lot of variations, like the man out west who wrote "Now my grief is this: How is a man whose time is worth $3 an hour in his regular profession, going to spend more than a year of his time writing plays, only to have them turned down?" Another man says he has written for years but seems to be a "rank amateur" when it comes to getting his plays over and what chance does he stand, &c.?"

Every amateur stands the same chance that every professional stood before he became a professional. No man was ever born into the world a professional playwright. No man ever will be. Some have been born with more brains than others. Some have imagination; others lack it. Some have the persistence that others need, but every last man, woman and child has the same starting chance. The professional is merely the experienced amateur. He was an amateur at one time, but instead of sitting down and worrying because he was an amateur and not a professional, he got out and hustled and graduated into the professional class. He did not spend his time in vain regrets. He worked. He knew that he had it in him and that the way to bring it out was to work hard and faithfully, and so he worked hard and long and then he was not an amateur any more. No man ever stands a chance of becoming a professional until he stops worrying himself and others because he is an amateur and not a professional. Now and then a man will seem almost to step into the professional class at once. Others may take a couple of years, but given an intelligent imagination and a sense of the humorous or the dramatic and the only difference between the amateur and the professional standing is merely a matter of work.

Up to a certain point an egg is a good thing. Then comes a time when it is not exactly an egg and certainly not a chicken and then it is not worth much. The professional is the egg of the amateur hatched out into the chicken of the practised hand, but the trouble with the photoplay writing business is that too many linger around the half hatched stage when they are neither a good egg nor a complete chicken, then they spend the rest of the time lamenting the fact that they are useless.

Don't ask what chance you stand against the professional. Grit your teeth, roll up your sleeves and go to work just as all the other professionals had to do. Until you become a professional you have no business expecting to have any chance and you are lucky that you can, occasionally, sell a script during the practice period. Be glad you sell; be grateful. Don't waste time weeping because you do not sell more. Don't complain that Jim Smith sells three hundred dollars worth a week and you sold one script for fifteen dollars. When you have worked as long as Jim Smith has, you'll be selling as much as he, if you have an imagination as good. Until then you have no more right to expect the same success than you have to kick because Mr. Wilson is president and not you. And until you can get this argued out in your brain, dear friend Amateur, you'll be of no use to yourself or anyone else. No one, unless it was the correspondence schools, ever asked you to write scripts. No one urged you to give up clerking or sweeping the streets or whatever it was you were doing, and become an author. You came into the game of your own free will and unless you are willing to play the game, it will be better for you to get out again. This is no place for a kicker or a whiner. Come in and take the knocks and you may win out, but if you spend all your time weeping over your pitiful condition, your eyes will be so filled with tears that you cannot see to write.

Day after day we get letters that speak of "my script" or that says "I have written three scripts, but have not sold one yet," and stuff like that. It's foolish talk. Then there is the woman who finds she must do something to support herself, so she wants to write stories. That is foolish talk too. She would not look for a job as cook without knowing how to cook, but of course she can buy some paper and hire a typewriter and right away make a lot of money and buy a pair of heavy boots with which to kick the wolf from the door.

Photoplay writing is a profession, the same as writing fiction or the practice of medicine or law. It is something that must be studied, and no one should take up the work unless he or she is willing not only to study, but to study carefully. A physician has to kill a few people before he is a good doctor. A lawyer must lose cases before he can become a good practitioner. A play writer must do a lot of seemingly unprofitable work before proficiency comes. The man quoted above who gets three dollars an hour out of his profession never learned that profession in a year. It probably took him several years, and this is his reward, but in spite of that he kicks because he cannot master photoplay in a year and make more. His wail induces a weariness of the spirit. No matter how clever he may be in his profession, he is a boob or he would know better.

You spend several years in school merely to get enough of an education to qualify you for something a little better than ditch digging. Why expect to become a ready-made professional photoplaywright? There ain't no such thing and there ain't ever a-goin' to be. The only way to stop being an amateur is to work over to the professional end. Then you'll have the same chance.

Hobart With Kalem.

C. D. Hobart, who was one of those "rank amateurs" eight months ago has been added to the Kalem script staff. Mr. Hobart started to write scripts eight months ago, but he had literary training back of it.

Inquest Circles.

Numerous applications have been received for charters for Inquest Circles, but there are not yet enough. Before the end of the year we want to see a circle in every city and most of the larger towns. If you want to belong to a circle write in enclosing a stamped return envelope. If you are willing to form a circle in case there is none in your town please state that fact.

Due Warning.

About this time or a little later, that Morning Telegraph Prize Contest is due to be decided. If you do not like the way it was decided, please tell the Telegraph. We have nothing to do with the matter and we are not going to reply to any boom letters. We are still getting a lot of yawps about the Vitagraph-Sun contest, and we had nothing to do with that. One man wanted to know if we could tell him of any in the supplementary list who had received checks, intimating that the supplementary list was a fraud. We personally know a dozen who have received satisfactory checks. Naturally we are not interested in his kick, particularly as he did not have the courage to sign his name.

War Extra.

Do not write stories about the war in Europe. You can't give them away.

Effects.

Even if you have been told that anything in reason is possible to the camera, do not write a series of scripts calculated to show to the fullest just what the camera can do.

Almost anyone who has written a couple of stories can conceive a railroad wreck for the big scene of a play. He can use aeroplanes, balloons, wrecked steamships and all the rest. We know a little girl of ten who has a collection of scripts that suggest the battles, murders and sudden deaths of a whole month's file of sensational newspapers, but not one is a story. Almost anyone can write a white-slave story that will be sensational enough to draw business if it is produced. Anyone can work the "big sensations" and "startling effects" into a story, but it takes a master workman to produce as strong a story with the commonplace things and get his effect from the story.

That's the sort of cuss the manufacturers are looking for; the men who really can write. They are still not finding many of them but they are coming along and making good and most of them are getting tied up to some studio, for good workmen are still scarce.

Don't waste time and stamps and paper sending out stuff that is on at a cost of several thousand dollars, where another man can get the same big effect with a few hundred. Don't tear down an eleven-story building just to give Jim a chance to rescue Geraldine from a terrible death. Let him earn her gratitude in a simpler and more convincing way.
